MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Since the convening of Congress, one year ago, the nation has undergone a prostration in business and industries such as has not been witnessed with us for many years. Speculation as to the causes for this prostration might be indulged in without profit, because as many theories would be advanced as there would be independent writers—those who expressed their own views, without borrowing—upon the subject. Without indulging in theories as to the cause of this prostration, therefore, I will call your attention only to the fact, and to some plain questions as to which it would seem there should be no disagreement.

During this prostration two essential elements of prosperity have been most abundant: labor and capital. Both have been largely unemployed. Where security has been undoubted, capital has been attainable at very moderate rates. Where labor has been wanted, it has been found in abundance, at cheap rates compared with what—of necessities and comforts of life—could be purchased with the wages demanded. Two great elements of prosperity, therefore, have not been denied us. A third might be added: our soil and climate are unequaled, within the limits of any contiguous territory under one nationality, for its variety of products to feed and clothe a people, and in the amount of surplus to spare to feed less favored peoples. Therefore, with these facts in view, it seems to me that wise statesmanship, at this session of Congress, would dictate legislation ignoring the past; directing in proper channels these great elements of prosperity to any people. Debt, debt abroad, is the only element that can—with always a sound currency—enter into our affairs to cause any continued depression in the industries and prosperity of our people.

A great conflict for national existence made necessary, for temporary purposes, the raising of large sums of money from whatever source attainable. It made it necessary, in the wisdom of Congress—and I do not doubt their wisdom in the premises, regarding the necessity of the times—to devise a system of national currency, which it proved to be impossible to keep on a par with the recognized currency of the civilized world. This begot a spirit of speculation involving an extravagance and luxury not required for the happiness or prosperity of a people, and involving, both directly and indirectly, foreign indebtedness. The currency being of fluctuating value, and therefore unsafe to hold for legitimate transactions requiring money, became a subject of speculation within itself. These two causes, however, have involved us in a foreign indebtedness, contracted in good faith by borrower and lender, which should be paid in coin, and according to the bond agreed upon when the debt was contracted—gold or its equivalent. The good faith of the Government cannot be violated toward creditors without national disgrace. But our commerce should be encouraged; American ship-building and carrying capacity increased; foreign markets sought for products of the soil and manufactories, to the end that we may be able to pay these debts. Where a new market can be created for the sale of our products, either of the soil, the mine, or the manufactory, a new means is discovered of utilizing our idle capital and labor to the advantage of the whole people. But, in my judgment, the first step toward accomplishing this object is to secure a currency of fixed, stable value; a currency, good wherever civilization reigns; one which, if it becomes superabundant with one people, will find a market with some other; a currency which has as its basis the labor necessary to produce it, which will give to it its value. Gold and silver are now the recognized medium of exchange the civilized world over; and to this we should return with the least practicable delay. In view of the pledges of the American Congress when our present legal-tender system was adopted, and debt contracted, there should be no delay—certainly no unnecessary delay—in fixing, by legislation, a method by which we will return to specie. To the accomplishment of this end I invite your special attention. I believe firmly that there can be no prosperous and permanent revival of business and industries until a policy is adopted—with legislation to carry it out—looking to a return to a specie basis. It is easy to conceive that the debtor and speculative classes may think it of value to them to make so-called money abundant until they can throw a portion of their burdens upon others. But even these, I believe, would be disappointed in the result if a course should be pursued which will keep in doubt the value of the legal-tender medium of exchange. A revival of productive industry is needed by all classes; by none more than the holders of property, of whatever sort, with debts to liquidate from realization upon its sale. But admitting that these two classes of citizens are to be benefited by expansion, would it be honest to give it? Would not the general loss be too great to justify such relief? Would it not be just as honest and prudent to authorize each debtor to issue his own legal-tenders to the extent of his liabilities? Than to do this would it not be safer—for fear of over-issues by unscrupulous creditors—to say that all debt obligations are obliterated in the United States, and now we commence anew, each possessing all he has at the time free from incumbrance? These propositions are too absurd to be entertained for a moment by thinking or honest people. Yet every delay in preparation for final resumption partakes of this dishonesty, and is only less in degree as the hope is held out that a convenient season will at last arrive for the good work of redeeming our pledges to commence. It will never come, in my opinion, except by positive action by Congress, or by national disasters which will destroy, for a time at least, the credit of the individual and the state at large. A sound currency might be reached by total bankruptcy and discredit of the integrity of the nation and of individuals. I believe it is in the power of Congress at this session to devise such legislation as will renew confidence, revive all the industries, start us on a career of prosperity to last for many years, and to save the credit of the nation and of the people. Steps toward the return to a specie basis are the great requisites to this devoutly to be sought for end. There are others which I may touch upon hereafter.

A nation dealing in a currency below that of specie in value labors under two great disadvantages: First, having no use for the world's acknowledged medium of exchange, gold and silver, these are driven out of the country because there is no need for their use; second, the medium of exchange in use being of a fluctuating value—for, after all, it is only worth just what it will purchase of gold and silver; metals having an intrinsic value just in proportion to the honest labor it takes to produce them—a larger margin must be allowed for profit by the manufacturer and producer. It is months from the date of production to the date of realization. Interest upon capital must be charged, and risk of fluctuation in the value of that which is to be received in payment added. Hence, high prices, acting as a protection to the foreign producer, who receives nothing in exchange for the products of his skill and labor, except a currency good, at a stable value the world over. It seems to me that nothing is clearer than that the greater part of the burden of existing prostration, for the want of a sound financial system, falls upon the workingman, who must after all produce the wealth, and the salaried man, who superintends and conducts business. The burden falls upon them in two ways, by the deprivation of employment and by the decreased purchasing-power of their salaries. It is the duty of Congress to devise the method of correcting the evils which are acknowledged to exist, and not mine. But I will venture to suggest two or three things which seem to me as absolutely necessary to a return to specie payments, the first great requisite in a return to prosperity. The legal-tender clause to the law authorizing the issue of currency by the National Government should be repealed, to take effect as to all contracts entered into after a day fixed in the repealing act; not to apply, however, to payments of salaries by Government, or for other expenditures now provided by law to be paid in currency in the interval pending between repeal and final resumption. Provision should be made by which the Secretary of the Treasury can obtain gold as it may become necessary from time to time from the date when specie redemption commences. To this might and should be added a revenue sufficiently in excess of expenses to insure an accumulation of gold in the Treasury to sustain permanent redemption.

I commend this subject to your careful consideration, believing that a favorable solution is attainable, and if reached by this Congress that the present and future generations will ever gratefully remember it as their deliverer from a thralldom of evil and disgrace.

With resumption, free banking may be authorized with safety, giving the same full protection to bill-holders which they have under existing laws. Indeed, I would regard free banking as essential. It would give proper elasticity to the currency. As more currency should be required for the transaction of legitimate business, new banks would be started, and, in turn, banks would wind up their business when it was found that there was a superabundance of currency. The experience and judgment of the people can best decide just how much currency is required for the transaction of the business of the country. It is unsafe to leave the settlement of this question to Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Executive. Congress should make the regulation under which banks may exist, but should not make banking a monopoly by limiting the amount of redeemable paper currency that shall be authorized. Such importance do I attach to this subject, and so earnestly do I commend it to your attention, that I give it prominence by introducing it at the beginning of this message.

During the past year nothing has occurred to disturb the general friendly and cordial relations of the United States with other powers.

The correspondence submitted herewith between this Government and its diplomatic representatives, as also with the representatives of other countries, shows a satisfactory condition of all questions between the United States and the most of those countries, and with few exceptions, to which reference is hereafter made, the absence of any points of difference to be adjusted.

The notice directed by the resolution of Congress of June 17, 1874, to be given to terminate the convention of July 17, 1858, between the United States and Belgium has been given, and the treaty will accordingly terminate on the 1st day of July, 1875. This convention secured to certain Belgian vessels entering the ports of the United States exceptional privileges which are not accorded to our own vessels. Other features of the convention have proved satisfactory, and have tended to the cultivation of mutually beneficial commercial intercourse and friendly relations between the two countries. I hope that negotiations which have been invited will result in the celebration of another treaty which may tend to the interests of both countries.

Our relations with China continue to be friendly. During the past year the fear of hostilities between China and Japan, growing out of the landing of an armed force upon the island of Formosa by the latter, has occasioned uneasiness. It is earnestly hoped, however, that the difficulties arising from this cause will be adjusted, and that the advance of civilization in these empires may not be retarded by a state of war. In consequence of the part taken by certain citizens of the United States in this expedition, our representatives in those countries have been instructed to impress upon the governments of China and Japan the firm intention of this country to maintain strict neutrality in the event of hostilities, and to carefully prevent any infraction of law on the part of our citizens.

In connection with this subject I call the attention of Congress to a generally-conceded fact—that the great proportion of the Chinese immigrants who come to our shores do not come voluntarily to make their homes with us and their labor productive of general prosperity, but come under contracts with head-men who own them almost absolutely. In a worse form does this apply to Chinese women. Hardly a perceptible percentage of them perform any honorable labor, but they are brought for shameful purposes, to the disgrace of the communities where settled and to the great demoralization of the youth of those localities. If this evil practice can be legislated against, it will be my pleasure as well as duty to enforce any regulation to secure so desirable an end.

It is hoped that negotiations between the government of Japan and the treaty powers, looking to the further opening of the empire, and to the removal of various restrictions upon trade and travel, may soon produce the results desired, which cannot fail to inure to the benefit of all the parties. Having on previous occasions submitted to the consideration of Congress the propriety of the release of the Japanese government from the further payment of the indemnity under the convention of October 22, 1864, and as no action had been taken thereon, it became my duty to regard the obligations of the convention as in force; and as the other powers interested had received their portion of the indemnity in full, the minister of the United States in Japan has, in behalf of this Government, received the remainder of the amount due to the United States under the convention of Simonoseki. I submit the propriety of applying the income of a part if not of the whole of this fund to the education in the Japanese language of a number of young men to be under obligations to serve the Government for a specified time as interpreters at the legation and the consulates in Japan. A limited number of Japanese youths might at the same time be educated in our own vernacular, and mutual benefits would result to both governments. The importance of having our own citizens, competent and familiar with the language of Japan, to act as interpreters and in other capacities connected with the legation and the consulates in that country, cannot readily be overestimated.

The amount awarded to the government of Great Britain by the mixed commission organized under the provisions of the treaty of Washington in settlement of the claims of British subjects arising from acts committed between April 13, 1861, and April 9, 1865, became payable, under the terms of the treaty, within the past year, and was paid upon the 21st day of September, 1874. In this connection, I renew my recommendation, made at the opening of the last session of Congress, that a special court be created to hear and determine all claims of aliens against the United States arising from acts committed against their persons or property during the insurrection. It appears equitable that opportunity should be offered to citizens of other states to present their claims, as well as to those British subjects whose claims were not admissible under the late commission, to the early decision of some competent tribunal. To this end, I recommend the necessary legislation to organize a court to dispose of all claims of aliens of the nature referred to, in an equitable and satisfactory manner, and to relieve Congress and the Departments from the consideration of these questions.

The legislation necessary to extend to the colony of Newfoundland certain articles of the treaty of Washington of the 8th day of May, 1871, having been had, a protocol to that effect was signed in behalf of the United States and of Great Britain, on the 28th day of May last, and was duly proclaimed on the following day. A copy of the proclamation is submitted herewith.

A copy of the report of the commissioner appointed under the act of March 19, 1872, for surveying and marking the boundary between the United States and the British possessions, from the Lake of the Woods to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, is herewith transmitted. I am happy to announce that the field-work of the commission has been completed, and the entire line, from the northwest corner of the Lake of the Woods to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, has been run and marked upon the surface of the earth. It is believed that the amount remaining unexpended of the appropriation made at the last session of Congress will be sufficient to complete the office-work. I recommend that the authority of Congress be given to the use of the unexpended balance of the appropriation in the completion of the work of the commission in making its report and preparing the necessary maps.

The court known as the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, created by an act of Congress of the last session, has organized and commenced its work, and it is to be hoped that the claims admissible under the provisions of the act may be speedily ascertained and paid.

It has been deemed advisable to exercise the discretion conferred upon the Executive at the last session, by accepting the conditions required by the government of Turkey for the privilege of allowing citizens of the United States to hold real estate in the former country, and by assenting to a certain change in the jurisdiction of courts in the latter. A copy of the proclamation upon these subjects is herewith communicated.

There has been no material change in our relations with the independent states of this hemisphere which were formerly under the dominion of Spain. Marauding on the frontiers, between Mexico and Texas, still frequently takes place despite the vigilance of the civil and military authorities in that quarter. The difficulty of checking such trespasses along the course of a river of such length as the Rio Grande, and so often fordable, is obvious. It is hoped that the efforts of this Government will be seconded by those of Mexico to the effectual suppression of these acts of wrong.

From a report upon the condition of the business before the American and Mexican Joint Claims Commission, made by the agent on the part of the United States, and dated October 28, 1874, it appears that of the 1,017 claims filed on the part of citizens of the United States, 483 had been finally decided, and 75 were in the hands of the umpire, leaving 462 to be disposed of; and of the 998 claims filed against the United States, 726 had been finally decided; one was before the umpire, and 271 remained to be disposed of. Since the date of such report other claims have been disposed of, reducing somewhat the number still pending; and others have been passed upon by the arbitrators. It has become apparent, in view of these figures, and of the fact that the work devolving on the umpire is particularly laborious, that the commission will be unable to dispose of the entire number of claims pending prior to the 1st day of February, 1875—the date fixed for its expiration. Negotiations are pending looking to the securing of the results of the decisions which have been reached, and to a further extension of the commission for a limited time, which it is confidently hoped will suffice to bring all the business now before it to a final close.

The strife in the Argentine Republic is to be deplored, both on account of the parties thereto and from the probable effects on the interests of those engaged in the trade to that quarter, of whom the United States are among the principal. As yet, so far as I am aware, there has been no violation of our neutrality rights, which, as well as our duties in that respect, it shall be my endeavor to maintain and observe.

It is with regret I announce that no further payment has been received from the government of Venezuela on account of awards in favor of citizens of the United States. Hopes have been entertained that if that republic could escape both foreign and civil war for a few years its great natural resources would enable it to honor its obligations. Though it is now understood to be at peace with other countries, a serious insurrection is reported to be in progress in an important region of that republic. This may be taken advantage of as another reason to delay the payment of the dues of our citizens.

The deplorable strife in Cuba continues without any marked change in the relative advantages of the contending forces. The insurrection continues, but Spain has gained no superiority. Six years of strife give to the insurrection a significance which cannot be denied. Its duration and the tenacity of its adherence, together with the absence of manifested power of suppression on the part of Spain, cannot be controverted, and may make some positive steps on the part of other powers a matter of self-necessity. I had confidently hoped, at this time, to be able to announce the arrangement of some of the important questions between this Government and that of Spain, but the negotiations have been protracted. The unhappy intestine dissensions of Spain command our profound sympathy, and must be accepted as perhaps a cause of some delay. An early settlement, in part at least, of the questions between the governments is hoped. In the mean time, awaiting the results of immediately pending negotiations, I defer a further and fuller communication on the subject of the relations of this country and Spain.

I have again to call the attention of Congress to the unsatisfactory condition of the existing laws with reference to expatriation and the election of nationality. Formerly, amid conflicting opinions and decisions it was difficult to exactly determine how far the doctrine of perpetual allegiance was applicable to citizens of the United States. Congress by the act of the 27th of July, 1868, asserted the abstract right of expatriation as a fundamental principle of this Government. Notwithstanding such assertion, and the necessity of frequent application of the principle, no legislation has been had defining what acts or formalities shall work expatriation, or when a citizen shall be deemed to have renounced or to have lost his citizenship. The importance of such definition is obvious. The representatives of the United States in foreign countries are continually called upon to lend their aid and the protection of the United States to persons concerning the good faith or the reality of whose citizenship there is at least great question. In some cases the provisions of the treaties furnish some guide; in others, it seems left to the person claiming the benefits of citizenship, while living in a foreign country, contributing in no manner to the performance of the duties of a citizen of the United States, and without intention at any time to return and undertake those duties, to use the claims to citizenship of the United States simply as a shield from the performance of the obligations of a citizen elsewhere.

The status of children born of American parents residing in a foreign country, of American women who have married aliens, of American citizens residing abroad where such question is not regulated by treaty, are all sources of frequent difficulty and discussion. Legislation on these and similar questions, and particularly defining when and under what circumstances expatriation can be accomplished or is to be presumed, is especially needed. In this connection I earnestly call the attention of Congress to the difficulties arising from fraudulent naturalization. The United States wisely, freely, and liberally offers its citizenship to all who may come in good faith to reside within its limits on their complying with certain prescribed reasonable and simple formalities and conditions. Among the highest duties of the Government is that to afford firm, sufficient, and equal protection to all its citizens, whether native-born or naturalized. Care should be taken that a right, carrying with it such support from the Government, should not be fraudulently obtained, and should be bestowed only upon full proof of a compliance with the law; and yet frequent instances are brought to the attention of the Government of illegal and fraudulent naturalization, and of the unauthorized use of certificates thus improperly obtained. In some cases the fraudulent character of the naturalization has appeared upon the face of the certificate itself; in others examination discloses that the holder had not complied with the law; and in others certificates have been obtained where the persons holding them not only were not entitled to be naturalized, but had not even been within the United States at the time of the pretended naturalization. Instances of each of these classes of fraud are discovered at our legations, where the certificates of naturalization are presented, either for the purpose of obtaining passports, or in demanding the protection of the legation. When the fraud is apparent on the face of such certificates, they are taken up by the representatives of the Government and forwarded to the Department of State. But even then the record of the court in which the fraudulent naturalization occurred remains, and duplicate certificates are readily obtainable. Upon the presentation of these for the issue of passports, or in demanding protection of the Government, the fraud sometimes escapes notice, and such certificates are not infrequently used in transactions of business to the deception and injury of innocent parties. Without placing any additional obstacles in the way of the obtainment of citizenship by the worthy and well-intentioned foreigner who comes in good faith to cast his lot with ours, I earnestly recommend further legislation to punish fraudulent naturalization and to secure the ready cancellation of the record of every naturalization made in fraud.

Since my last annual message the exchange has been made of the ratification of treaties of extradition with Belgium, Ecuador, Peru, and Salvador; also of a treaty of commerce and navigation with Peru, and one of commerce and consular privileges with Salvador; all of which have been duly proclaimed, as has also a declaration with Russia with reference to trade-marks.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which, by law, is made directly to Congress, and forms no part of this message, will show the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the last fiscal year; the amount received from each source of revenue, and the amount paid out for each of the departments of Government. It will be observed from this report that the amount of receipts over expenditures has been but $2,344,882.30 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and that for the current fiscal year the estimated receipts over expenditures will not much exceed nine millions of dollars. In view of the large national debt existing, and the obligation to add one per cent. per annum to the sinking-fund, a sum amounting now to over $34,000,000 per annum, I submit whether revenues should not be increased or expenditures diminished to reach this amount of surplus. Not to provide for the sinking-fund is a partial failure to comply with the contracts and obligations of the Government. At the last session of Congress a very considerable reduction was made in rates of taxation, and in the number of articles submitted to taxation; the question may well be asked whether or not, in some instances, unwisely. In connection with this subject, too, I venture the opinion that the means of collecting the revenue, especially from imports, have been so embarrassed by legislation as to make it questionable whether or not large amounts are not lost by failure to collect, to the direct loss of the Treasury and to the prejudice of the interests of honest importers and tax-payers.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his report favors legislation looking to an early return to specie payments, thus supporting views previously expressed in this message. He also recommends economy in appropriations; calls attention to the loss of revenue from repealing the tax on tea and coffee, without benefit to the consumer; recommends an increase of ten cents a gallon on whisky, and, further, that no modification be made in the banking and currency bill passed at the last session of Congress, unless modification should become necessary by reason of the adoption of measures for returning to specie payments. In these recommendations I cordially join.

I would suggest to Congress the propriety of re-adjusting the tariff so as to increase the revenue, and, at the same time, decrease the number of articles upon which duties are levied. Those articles which enter into our manufactures, and are not produced at home, it seems to me should be entered free. Those articles of manufacture which we produce a constituent part of, but do not produce the whole, that part which we do not produce should enter free also. I will instance fine wool, dyes, &c. These articles must be imported to form a part of the manufacture of the higher grades of woollen goods. Chemicals used as dyes, compounded in medicines, and used in various ways in manufactures, come under this class. The introduction, free of duty, of such wools as we do not produce would stimulate the manufacture of goods requiring the use of those we do produce, and, therefore, would be a benefit to home production. There are many articles entering into "home manufactures" which we do not produce ourselves, the tariff upon which increases the cost of producing the manufactured article. All corrections in this regard are in the direction of bringing labor and capital in harmony with each other, and of supplying one of the elements of prosperity so much needed.

The report of the Secretary of War, herewith attached, and forming a part of this message, gives all the information concerning the operations, wants, and necessities of the Army, and contains many suggestions and recommendations which I commend to your special attention.

There is no class of Government employés who are harder worked than the Army—officers and men; none who perform their tasks more cheerfully and efficiently, and under circumstances of greater privations and hardships.

Legislation is desirable to render more efficient this branch of the public service. All the recommendations of the Secretary of War I regard as judicious, and I especially commend to your attention the following: The consolidation of Government arsenals; the restoration of mileage to officers traveling under orders; the exemption of money received from the sale of subsistence stores from being covered into the Treasury; the use of appropriations for the purchase of subsistence stores without waiting for the beginning of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made; for additional appropriations for the collection of torpedo material; for increased appropriations for the manufacture of arms; for relieving the various States from indebtedness for arms charged to them during the rebellion; for dropping officers from the rolls of the Army without trial for the offense of drawing pay more than once for the same period; for the discouragement of the plan to pay soldiers by checks; and for the establishment of a professorship of rhetoric and English literature at West Point. The reasons for these recommendations are obvious, and are set forth sufficiently in the reports attached. I also recommend that the status of the staff corps of the Army be fixed—where this has not already been done—so that promotions may be made and vacancies filled as they occur in each grade when reduced below the number to be fixed by law. The necessity for such legislation is specially felt now in the Pay Department. The number of officers in that department is below the number adequate to the performance of the duties required of them by law.

The efficiency of the Navy has been largely increased during the last year. Under the impulse of the foreign complications which threatened us at the commencement of the last session of Congress, most of our efficient wooden ships were put in condition for immediate service, and the repairs of our iron-clad fleet were pushed with the utmost vigor. The result is that most of these are now in an effective state, and need only to be manned and put in commission to go at once into service.

Some of the new sloops authorized by Congress are already in commission, and most of the remainder are launched and wait only the completion of their machinery to enable them to take their places as part of our effective force.

Two iron torpedo-ships have been completed during the last year, and four of our large double-turreted iron-clads are now undergoing repairs. When these are finished, everything that is useful of our Navy, as now authorized, will be in condition for service, and with the advance in the science of torpedo warfare, the American Navy, comparatively small as it is, will be found at any time powerful for the purposes of a peaceful nation.

Much has been accomplished during the year in aid of science and to increase the sum of general knowledge and further the interests of commerce and civilization. Extensive and much-needed soundings have been made for hydrographic purposes and to fix the proper routes of ocean telegraphs. Further surveys of the great Isthmus have been undertaken and completed, and two vessels of the Navy are now employed, in conjunction with those of England, France, Germany, and Russia, in observations connected with the transit of Venus, so useful and interesting to the scientific world.

The estimates for this branch of the public service do not differ materially from those of last year, those for the general support of the service being somewhat less, and those for permanent improvements at the various stations rather larger than the corresponding estimate made a year ago. The regular maintenance and a steady increase in the efficiency of this most important arm in proportion to the growth of our maritime intercourse and interests, is recommended to the attention of Congress.

The use of the Navy in time of peace might be further utilized by a direct authorization of the employment of naval vessels in explorations and surveys of the supposed navigable waters of other nationalities on this continent; specially the tributaries of the two great rivers of South America, the Orinoco and the Amazon. Nothing prevents, under existing laws, such exploration, except that expenditures must be made in such expeditions beyond those usually provided for in the appropriations. The field designated is unquestionably one of interest and one capable of large development of commercial interests advantageous to the peoples reached, and to those who may establish relations with them.

Education of the people entitled to exercise the right of franchise I regard essential to general prosperity everywhere, and especially so in republics, where birth, education, or previous condition does not enter into account in giving suffrage. Next to the public school, the post-office is the great agent of education over our vast territory; the rapidity with which new sections are being settled, thus increasing the carrying of mails in a more rapid ratio than the increase of receipts, is not alarming. The report of the Postmaster-General, herewith attached, shows that there was an increase of revenue in his Department in 1873 over the previous year of $1,674,411, and an increase of cost of carrying the mails and paying employes of $3,041,468.91. The report of the Postmaster-General gives interesting statistics of his Department, and compares them with the corresponding statistics of a year ago, showing a growth in every branch of the Department.

A postal convention has been concluded with New South Wales, an exchange of postal cards established with Switzerland, and the negotiations pending for several years past with France have been terminated in a convention with that country, which went into effect last August.

An international postal congress was convened in Berne, Switzerland, in September last, at which the United States was represented by an officer of the Post-Office Department of much experience and of qualification for the position. A convention for the establishment of an international postal union was agreed upon and signed by the delegates of the countries represented, subject to the approval of the proper authorities of those countries.

I respectfully direct your attention to the report of the Postmaster-General, and to his suggestions in regard to an equitable adjustment of the question of compensation to railroads for carrying the mails.

Your attention will be drawn to the unsettled condition of affairs in some of the Southern States.

On the 14th of September last, the governor of Louisiana called upon me, as provided by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to aid in suppressing domestic violence in that State. This call was made in view of a proclamation issued on that day by D. B. Penn, claiming that he was elected lieutenant-governor in 1872, and calling upon the militia of the State to arm, assemble, and drive from power the usurpers, as he designated the officers of the State government. On the next day I issued my proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse within five days from the date thereof, and subsequently learned that on that day they had taken forcible possession of the State-house. Steps were taken by me to support the existing and recognized State government; but before the expiration of the five days the insurrectionary movement was practically abandoned, and the officers of the State government, with some minor exceptions, resumed their powers and duties. Considering that the present State administration of Louisiana has been the only government in that State for nearly two years; that it has been tacitly acknowledged and acquiesced in as such by Congress, and more than once expressly recognized by me, I regarded it as my clear duty, when legally called upon for that purpose, to prevent its overthrow by an armed mob under pretense of fraud and irregularity in the election of 1872. I have heretofore called the attention of Congress to this subject, stating that, on account of the frauds and forgeries committed at said election, and because it appears that the returns thereof were never legally canvassed, it was impossible to tell thereby who were chosen; but, from the best sources of information at my command, I have always believed that the present State officers received a majority of the legal votes actually cast at that election. I repeat what I said in my special message of February 23, 1873, that in the event of no action by Congress I must continue to recognize the government heretofore recognized by me.

I regret to say that, with preparations for the late election, decided indications appeared in some localities in the Southern States of a determination, by acts of violence and intimidation, to deprive citizens of the freedom of the ballot, because of their political opinions. Bands of men, masked and armed, made their appearance; White Leagues and other societies were formed; large quantities of arms and ammunition were imported and distributed to these organizations; military drills, with menacing demonstrations, were held; and, with all these, murders enough were committed to spread terror among those whose political action was to be suppressed, if possible, by these intolerant and criminal proceedings. In some places colored laborers were compelled to vote according to the wishes of their employers, under threats of discharge if they acted otherwise; and there are too many instances in which, when these threats were disregarded, they were remorselessly executed by those who made them. I understand that the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was made to prevent this and a like state of things, and the act of May 31, 1870, with amendments, was passed to enforce its provisions, the object of both being to guarantee to all citizens the right to vote and to protect them in the free enjoyment of that right. Enjoined by the Constitution "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and convinced by undoubted evidence that violations of said act had been committed, and that a wide-spread and flagrant disregard of it was contemplated, the proper officers were instructed to prosecute the offenders, and troops were stationed at convenient points to aid these officers, if necessary, in the performance of their official duties. Complaints are made of this interference by Federal authority; but if said amendment and act do not provide for such interference under the circumstances as above stated, then they are without meaning, force, or effect, and the whole scheme of colored enfranchisement is worse than mockery, and little better than a crime. Possibly Congress may find it due to truth and justice to ascertain, by means of a committee, whether the alleged wrongs to colored citizens for political purposes are real, or the reports thereof were manufactured for the occasion.

The whole number of troops in the States of Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, Maryland, and Virginia, at the time of the election, was four thousand and eighty-two. This embraces the garrisons of all the forts from the Delaware to the Gulf of Mexico.

Another trouble has arisen in Arkansas. Article 13th of the constitution of that State (which was adopted in 1868, and upon the approval of which by Congress the State was restored to representation as one of the States of the Union) provides in effect that, before any amendments proposed to this constitution shall become a part thereof, they shall be passed by two successive assemblies, and then submitted to and ratified by a majority of the electors of the State voting thereon. On the 11th of May, 1874, the governor convened an extra session of the general assembly of the State, which, on the 18th of the same month, passed an act providing for a convention to frame a new constitution. Pursuant to this act, and at an election held on the 30th of June, 1874, the convention was approved, and delegates were chosen thereto, who assembled on the 14th of last July and framed a new constitution, the schedule of which provided for the election of an entire new set of State officers in a manner contrary to the then existing election laws of the State. On the 13th of October, 1874, this constitution, as therein provided, was submitted to the people for their approval or rejection, and according to the election-returns was approved by a large majority of those qualified to vote thereon, and at the same election persons were chosen to fill all the State, county, and township offices. The governor elected in 1872 for the term of four years turned over his office to the governor chosen under the new constitution; whereupon the lieutenant-governor, also elected in 1872 for a term of four years, claiming to act as governor, and alleging that said proceedings by which the new constitution was made and a new set of officers elected were unconstitutional, illegal, and void, called upon me, as provided in section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, to protect the State against domestic violence. As Congress is now investigating the political affairs of Arkansas, I have declined to interfere.

The whole subject of Executive interference with the affairs of a State is repugnant to public opinion, to the feeling of those who, from their official capacity, must be used in such interposition, and to him or those who must direct. Unless most clearly on the side of law, such interference becomes a crime; with the law to support it, it is condemned without a hearing. I desire, therefore, that all necessity for Executive direction in local affairs may become unnecessary and obsolete. I invite the attention, not of Congress, but of the people of the United States, to the causes and effects of these unhappy questions. Is there not a disposition on one side to magnify wrongs and outrages, and on the other side to belittle them or justify them? If public opinion could be directed to a correct survey of what is, and to rebuking wrong, and aiding the proper authorities in punishing it, a better state of feeling would be inculcated, and the sooner we would have that peace which would leave the States free indeed to regulate their own domestic affairs. I believe on the part of our citizens of the Southern States—the better part of them—there is a disposition to be law-abiding, and to do no violence either to individuals or to the laws existing. But do they do right in ignoring the existence of violence and bloodshed in resistance to constituted authority? I sympathize with their prostrate condition, and would do all in my power to relieve them; acknowledging that in some instances they have had most trying governments to live under, and very oppressive ones in the way of taxation for nominal improvements, not giving benefits equal to the hardships imposed; but, can they proclaim themselves entirely irresponsible for this condition? They cannot. Violence has been rampant in some localities, and has either been justified or denied by those who could have prevented it. The theory is even raised that there is to be no further interference on the part of the General Government to protect citizens within a State where the State authorities fail to give protection. This is a great mistake. While I remain Executive all the laws of Congress, and the provisions of the Constitution, including the recent amendments added thereto, will be enforced with rigor, but with regret that they should have added one jot or tittle to Executive duties or powers. Let there be fairness in the discussion of Southern questions, the advocates of both, or all political parties, giving honest, truthful reports of occurrences, condemning the wrong and upholding the right, and soon all will be well. Under existing conditions the negro votes the republican ticket because he knows his friends are of that party. Many a good citizen votes the opposite, not because he agrees with the great principles of state which separate parties, but because, generally, he is opposed to negro rule. This is a most delusive cry. Treat the negro as a citizen and a voter—as he is and must remain—and soon parties will be divided, not on the color line, but on principle. Then we shall have no complaint of sectional interference.

The report of the Attorney-General contains valuable recommendations relating to the administration of justice in the courts of the United States, to which I invite your attention.

I respectfully suggest to Congress the propriety of increasing the number of judicial districts in the United States to eleven, the present number being nine, and the creation of two additional judgeships. The territory to be traversed by the circuit judges is so great, and the business of the courts so steadily increasing, that it is growing more and more impossible for them to keep up with the business requiring their attention. Whether this would involve the necessity of adding two more Justices of the Supreme Court to the present number I submit to the judgment of Congress.

The attention of Congress is invited to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and to the legislation asked for by him. The domestic interests of the people are more intimately connected with this Department than with either of the other Departments of Government. Its duties have been added to from time to time until they have become so onerous that without the most perfect system and order it will be impossible for any Secretary of the Interior to keep trace of all official transactions having his sanction and done in his name, and for which he is held personally responsible.

The policy adopted for the management of Indian affairs, known as the peace policy, has been adhered to with most beneficial results. It is confidently hoped that a few years more will relieve our frontiers from danger of Indian depredations.

I commend the recommendation of the Secretary for the extension of the homestead laws to the Indians, and for some sort of territorial government for the Indian Territory. A great majority of the Indians occupying this Territory are believed yet to be incapable of maintaining their rights against the more civilized and enlightened white man. Any territorial form of government given them, therefore, should protect them in their homes and property for a period of at least twenty years, and before its final adoption should be ratified by a majority of those affected.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior, herewith attached, gives much interesting statistical information, which I abstain from giving an abstract of, but refer you to the report itself.

The act of Congress providing the oath which pensioners must subscribe to before drawing their pensions cuts off from this bounty a few survivors of the war of 1812 residing in the Southern States. I recommend the restoration of this bounty to all such. The number of persons whose names would thus be restored to the list of pensioners is not large. They are all old persons who could have taken no part in the rebellion, and the services for which they were awarded pensions were in defense of the whole country.

The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, herewith, contains suggestions of much interest to the general public, and refers to the approaching Centennial and the part his Department is ready to take in it. I feel that the nation at large is interested in having this Exposition a success, and commend to Congress such action as will secure a greater general interest in it. Already many foreign nations have signified their intention to be represented at it, and it may be expected that every civilized nation will be represented.

The rules adopted to improve the civil service of the Government have been adhered to as closely as has been practicable with the opposition with which they meet. The effect, I believe, has been beneficial on the whole, and has tended to the elevation of the service. But it is impracticable to maintain them without direct and positive support of Congress. Generally the support which this reform receives is from those who give it their support only to find fault when the rules are apparently departed from. Removals from office without preferring charges against parties removed are frequently cited as departures from the rules adopted, and the retention of those against whom charges are made by irresponsible persons and without good grounds, is also often condemned as a violation of them. Under these circumstances, therefore, I announce that if Congress adjourns without positive legislation on the subject of "civil-service reform," I will regard such action as a disapproval of the system, and will abandon it, except so far as to require examinations for certain appointees, to determine their fitness. Competitive examinations will be abandoned.

The gentlemen who have given their services without compensation, as members of the board to devise rules and regulations for the government of the civil service of the country, have shown much zeal and earnestness in their work, and to them, as well as to myself, it will be a source of mortification if it is to be thrown away. But I repeat that it is impossible to carry this system to a successful issue without general approval and assistance, and positive law to support it.

I have stated that three elements of prosperity to the nation, capital, labor, skilled and unskilled, and products of the soil, still remain with us. To direct the employment of these is a problem deserving the most serious attention of Congress. If employment can be given to all the labor offering itself, prosperity necessarily follows. I have expressed the opinion, and repeat it, that the first requisite to the accomplishment of this end is the substitution of a sound currency in place of one of a fluctuating value. This secured, there are many interests that might be fostered, to the great profit of both labor and capital. How to induce capital to employ labor is the question. The subject of cheap transportation has occupied the attention of Congress. Much new light on this question will without doubt be given by the committee appointed by the last Congress to investigate and report upon this subject.

A revival of ship-building, and particularly of iron-steamship-building, is of vast importance to our national prosperity. The United States is now paying over $100,000,000 per annum for freights and passage on foreign ships—to be carried abroad and expended in the employment and support of other peoples—beyond a fair percentage of what should go to foreign vessels, estimating on the tonnage and travel of each respectively. It is to be regretted that this disparity in the carrying-trade exists, and to correct it I would be willing to see a great departure from the usual course of Government in supporting what might usually be termed private enterprise. I would not suggest as a remedy direct subsidy to American steamship-lines, but I would suggest the direct offer of ample compensation for carrying the mails between Atlantic seaboard cities and the Continent on American-owned and American-built steamers and would extend this liberality to vessels carrying the mails to South American states and to Central America and Mexico, and would pursue the same policy from our Pacific sea-ports to foreign sea-ports on the Pacific. It might be demanded that vessels built for this service should come up to a standard fixed by legislation, in tonnage, speed, and all other qualities, looking to the possibility of Government requiring them at some time for war purposes. The right also of taking possession of them in such emergency should be guarded.

I offer these suggestions, believing them worthy of consideration, in all seriousness, affecting all sections and all interests alike. If anything better can be done to direct the country into a course of general prosperity, no one will be more ready than I to second the plan.

Forwarded herewith will be found the report of the commissioners appointed under an act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, to wind up the affairs of the District government. It will be seen from the report that the net debt of the District of Columbia, less securities on hand and available, is:

Bonded debt issued prior to July 1, 1874.....	$8,883,940 43
3.65 bonds, act of Congress June 20, 1874.....	2,088,168 73
Certificates of the board of audit.....	4,770,558 45
	15,742,667 61

Less special-improvement assessments (chargeable to private property) in excess of any demand against such assessments.....	$1, 614, 054 37
Less Chesapeake and Ohio Canal bonds.....	75, 000 00
And Washington and Alexandria Railroad bonds.....	59, 000 00
In the hands of the commissioners of the sinking-fund		$1, 748, 054 37
Leaving actual debt less said assets		13, 994, 613 24

In addition to this there are claims preferred against the government of the District, amounting, in the estimated aggregate reported by the board of audit, to $3,147,787.48, of which the greater part will probably be rejected. This sum can with no more propriety be included in the debt account of the District government than can the thousands of claims against the General Government be included as a portion of the national debt. But the aggregate sum thus stated includes something more than the funded debt chargeable exclusively to the District of Columbia. The act of Congress of June 20, 1874, contemplates an apportionment between the United States Government and the District of Columbia, in respect of the payment of the principal and interest of the 3.65 bonds. Therefore, in computing with precision the bonded debt of the District, the aggregate sums above stated as respects 3.65 bonds now issued, the outstanding certificates of the board of audit, and the unadjusted claims pending before that board should be reduced to the extent of the amount to be apportioned to the United States Government in the manner indicated in the act of Congress of June 20, 1874.

I especially invite your attention to the recommendations of the commissioners of the sinking fund relative to the ambiguity of the act of June 20, 1874; the interest on the District bonds, and the consolidation of the indebtedness of the District.

I feel much indebted to the gentlemen who consented to leave their private affairs and come from a distance to attend to the business of this District, and for the able and satisfactory manner in which it has been conducted. I am sure their services will be equally appreciated by the entire country.

It will be seen from the accompanying full report of the Board of Health that the sanitary condition of the District is very satisfactory.

In my opinion the District of Columbia should be regarded as the grounds of the National Capital, in which the entire people are interested. I do not allude to this to urge generous appropriations to the District, but to draw the attention of Congress, in framing a law for the government of the District, to the magnificent scale on which the city was planned by the founders of the Government; the manner in which, for ornamental purposes, the reservations, streets, and avenues were laid out; and the proportion of the property actually possessed by the General Government. I think the proportion of the expenses of the government and improvements to be borne by the General Government, the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county, should be carefully and equitably defined.

In accordance with section 3, act approved June 23, 1874, I appointed a board to make a survey of the mouth of the Mississippi River with a view to determine the best method of obtaining and maintaining a depth of water sufficient for the purposes of commerce, &c.; and in accordance with an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a commission of engineers to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation," I appointed a commission of engineers. Neither board has yet completed its labors. When their reports are received they will be forwarded to Congress without delay.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
December 7, 1874.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, pursuant to the second section of the act of Congress approved the 23d of March last, entitled "An act to authorize the President to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman dominions and Egypt, established or to be established under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt," the President is authorized, for the benefit of American citizens residing in the Turkish dominions, to accept the recent law of the Ottoman Porte ceding the right of foreigners possessing immovable property in said dominions;

And whereas, pursuant to the authority thus in me vested, I have authorized George H. Boker, accredited as minister resident of the United States to the Ottoman Porte, to sign, on behalf of this Government, the protocol accepting the law aforesaid of the said Ottoman Porte, which protocol and law are, word for word, as follows:

[Translation.]

The United States of America and His Majesty the Sultan being desirous to establish by a special act the agreement entered upon between them regarding the admission of American citizens to the right of holding real estate granted to foreigners by the law promulgated on the 7th of Sepher, 1284, (January 18th, 1867,) have authorized:

The President of the United States of America, George H. Boker, minister-resident of the United States of America near the Sublime Porte, and

His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, His Excellency A. Aarifi Pasha, his minister of foreign affairs, to sign the Protocol which follows:

Protocol.

The law granting foreigners the right of holding real estate does not interfere with the immunities specified by the treaties, and which will continue to protect the person and the movable property of foreigners who may become owners of real estate.

As the exercise of this right of possessing real property may induce foreigners to establish themselves in larger numbers in the Ottoman Empire, the imperial government thinks it proper to anticipate and to prevent the difficulties to which the application of this law may give rise in certain localities. Such is the object of the arrangements which follow.

The domicile of any person residing upon the Ottoman soil being inviolable, and as no one can enter it without the consent of the owner, except by virtue of orders emanating from competent authority, and with the assistance of the magistrate or functionary invested with the necessary powers, the residence of foreigners is inviolable on the same principle, in conformity with the treaties, and the agents of the public force cannot enter it without the assistance of the consul or of the delegate of the consul of the power on which the foreigner depends.

By residence we understand the house of inhabitation and its dependencies: that is to say, the out-houses, courts, gardens, and neighboring inclosures, to the exclusion of all other parts of the property.

In the localities distant by less than nine hours' journey from the consular residence, the agents of the public force cannot enter the residence of a foreigner without the assistance of a consul, as was before said.

On his part the consul is bound to give his immediate assistance to the local authority, so as not to let six hours elapse between the moment which he may be informed and the moment of his departure, or the departure of his delegate, so that the action of the authorities may never be suspended more than twenty-four hours.

In the localities distant by nine hours or more than nine hours of travel from the residence of the consular agent, the agents of the public force may, on the request of the local authority, and with the assistance of three members of the council of the elders of the commune, enter into the residence of a foreigner, without being assisted by the consular agent, but only in case of urgency, and for the search and the proof of the crime of murder, of attempt at murder, of incendiarism, of armed robbery either with infraction or by night in an inhabited house, of armed rebellion, and of the fabrication of counterfeit money; and this entry may be made whether the crime was committed by a foreigner or by an Ottoman subject, and whether it took place in the residence of a foreigner or not in his residence, or any other place.

These regulations are not applicable but to the parts of the real estate which constitute the residence, as it has been heretofore defined.

Beyond the residence, the action of the police shall be exercised freely and without reserve; but in case a person charged with crime or offense should be arrested, and the accused shall be a foreigner, the immunities attached to his person shall be observed in respect to him.

The functionary or the officer charged with the accomplishment of a domiciliary visit, in the exceptional circumstances determined before, and the members of the council of elders who shall assist him, will be obliged to make out a procès-verbal of the domiciliary visit, and to communicate it immediately to the superior authority under whose jurisdiction they are, and the latter shall transmit it to the nearest consular agent, without delay.

A special regulation will be promulgated by the Sublime Porte, to determine the mode of action of the local police in the several cases provided heretofore.

In localities more distant than nine hours' travel from the residence of the consular agent, in which the law of the judicial organization of the valayet may be in force, foreigners shall be tried without the assistance of the consular delegate by the council of elders fulfilling the function of justices of the peace, and by the tribunal of the canton, as well for actions not exceeding one thousand piasters as for offenses entailing a fine of five hundred piasters only at the maximum.

Foreigners shall have, in any case, the right of appeal to the tribunal of the arrondissement against the judgments issued as above stated, and the appeal shall be followed and judged with the assistance of the consul, in conformity with the treaties.

The appeal shall always suspend the execution of a sentence.

In all cases the forcible execution of the judgments, issued on the conditions determined heretofore, shall not take place without the co-operation of the consul or of his delegate.

The imperial government will enact a law which shall determine the rules of procedure to be observed by the parties, in the application of the preceding regulations.

Foreigners, in whatever locality they may be, may freely submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the council of elders or of the tribunal of the canton, without the assistance of the consul, in cases which do not exceed the competency of these councils or tribunals, reserving always the right of appeal before the tribunal of the arrondissement, where the case may be brought and tried with the assistance of the consul or his delegate.

The consent of a foreigner to be tried as above stated, without the assistance of his consul, shall always be given in writing, and in advance of all procedure.

It is well understood that all these restrictions do not concern cases which have for their object questions of real estate, which shall be tried and determined under the conditions established by the law.

The right of defense and the publicity of the hearings shall be assured in all cases to the foreigners who may appear before the Ottoman tribunals, as well as to Ottoman subjects.

The preceding dispositions shall remain in force until the revision of the ancient treaties, a revision which the Sublime Porte reserves to itself the right to bring about hereafter by an understanding between it and the friendly powers.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the protocol, and have affixed thereto their seals.

Law conceding to foreigners the right of holding real estate in the Ottoman Empire.

Imperial Rescript.—Let it be done in conformity with the contents. 7 Sepher, 1284, (January 18, 1867.)

With the object of developing the prosperity of the country, to put an end to the difficulties, to the abuses, and to the uncertainties which have arisen on the subject of the right of foreigners to hold property in the Ottoman Empire, and to complete, in accordance with a precise regulation, the safeguards which are due to financial interests and to administrative action, the following legislative enactments have been promulgated by the order of his imperial majesty, the Sultan:

ARTICLE I. Foreigners are admitted, by the same privilege as Ottoman subjects, and without any other restriction, to enjoy the right of holding real estate, whether in the city or the country, throughout the empire, with the exception of the province of the Hédjaz, by submitting themselves to the laws and the regulations which govern Ottoman subjects, as is hereafter stated.

This arrangement does not concern subjects of Ottoman birth who have changed their nationality, who shall be governed in this matter by a special law.

ART. II. Foreigners, proprietors of real estate in town or in country, are in consequence placed upon terms of equality with Ottoman subjects in all things that concern their landed property.

The legal effect of this equality is—

1st. To oblige them to conform to all the laws and regulations of the police or of the municipality which govern at present or may govern hereafter the enjoyment, the transmission, the alienation, and the hypothecation of landed property.

2d. To pay all charges and taxes, under whatever form or denomination they may be, that are levied, or may be levied hereafter, upon city or country property.

3d. To render them directly amenable to the Ottoman civil tribunals in all questions relating to landed property, and in all real actions, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants, even when either party is a foreigner. In short, they are in all things to hold real estate by the same title, on the same condition, and under the same forms as Ottoman owners, and without being able to avail themselves of their personal nationality, except under the reserve of the immunities attached to their persons and their movable goods, according to the treaties.

ART. III. In case of the bankruptcy of a foreigner possessing real estate, the assignees of the bankrupt may apply to the authorities and to the Ottoman civil tribunals requiring the sale of the real estate possessed by the bankrupt, and which by its nature and according to law is responsible for the debts of the owner.

The same course shall be followed when a foreigner shall have obtained against another foreigner owning real estate a judgment of condemnation before a foreign tribunal.

For the execution of this judgment against the real estate of his debtor, he shall apply to the competent Ottoman authorities, in order to obtain the sale of that real estate which is responsible for the debts of the owner; and this judgment shall be executed by the Ottoman authorities and tribunals only after they have decided that the real estate of which the sale is required really belongs to the category of that property which may be sold for the payment of debt.

ART. IV. Foreigners have the privilege to dispose, by donation or by testament, of that real estate of which such disposition is permitted by law.

As to that real estate of which they may not have disposed, or of which the law does not permit them to dispose by gift or testament, its succession shall be governed in accordance with Ottoman law.

ART. V. All foreigners shall enjoy the privileges of the present law, as soon as the powers on which they depend shall agree to the arrangements proposed by the Sublime Porte for the exercise of the right to hold real estate.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, ULYSSES S. GRANT, President of the United States of America, have caused the said protocol and law to be made public for the information and guidance of citizens of the United States.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this twenty-ninth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America the [SEAL.] ninety-ninth.

U. S. GRANT.

By the President:

HAMILTON FISH,

Secretary of State.

Mr. Campbell to Mr. Fish.

UNITED STATES NORTHERN BOUNDARY COMMISSION,

Washington, December 2, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Department, a preliminary report and sketch from Major W. J.

Twining, United States Engineers, chief astronomer of the commission, showing the progress of the survey of the boundary during the past season.

From this report it will be seen that the survey of the boundary-line defined in the treaty of 1818 has been completed, and connected (on the summit of the Rocky Mountains) with the eastern terminus of the boundary-line from the Pacific Ocean defined in the treaty of 1846. The whole boundary-line between the United States and British Possessions has now been established, with the exception of the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska.

The United States commission and the British commission are now engaged in working out the results of their field operations for the purpose of preparing the final joint maps necessary to a proper representation of the boundary-line and the territories adjacent thereto.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL,
Commissioner Northern Boundary Survey.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

Major Twining to Mr. Campbell.

UNITED STATES NORTHERN BOUNDARY COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., December 1, 1874.

SIR: In answer to your request I respectfully submit a brief statement of the work performed by the commission during the past summer.

During the summer of 1873 the boundary was surveyed and marked from the "Red River of the North" west to longitude $106^{\circ} 12'$. For a distance of ninety miles the marks were of a temporary nature, and are to be replaced by permanent monuments. This arrangement resulted from a difference of opinion which existed at that time in regard to the true definition of the 49th parallel of latitude.

During the winter of 1873-'74 the surveys east of the Red River were completed to the Lake of the Woods, including the shore-line of that lake as far east as the Rainy River.

During the present season the work has been executed in the same manner as heretofore, under the agreement made last year between the chief astronomers of the United States and British commissions. This agreement was to the effect that the officers of the United States were to determine astronomical stations at intervals of forty miles, and to survey a belt of territory five miles wide south of the parallel; the English to determine a similar series of astronomical stations, and to survey an equal belt of topography north of the line.

The distance remaining to be surveyed during the present year was three hundred and fifty-eight miles, from longitude $106^{\circ} 12'$ to longitude $114^{\circ} 05'$. I organized the parties in St. Paul, Minn., on the 1st of June, and proceeded, by way of the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Missouri River, to Fort Buford. Thence, traveling by land, the advanced working-parties reached the line, at the initial point of this year's operations, on the 1st of July.

The shortness of the season, and the immense distance to be traveled after the work should be completed, required that it should be finished early in September. With this object in view, the working-parties were pushed to the utmost limit of their endurance, and, by the 1st of September, the eight astronomical stations assigned to the United States commission had been determined (by one party) and the line had been connected with the last station of the northwestern boundary, at the summit of the Rocky Mountains. Full details of the survey have been given in the preliminary reports from this office. Without recapitulation, I will only say that the results have been in every respect satisfactory.

The commission returned to Saint Paul by way of the Missouri River and the Northern Pacific Railroad, making the distance from Fort Benton to Bismarck, (1,200 miles,) in open boats, in eighteen days. The men were discharged on the 5th of October.

Thus in four months this expedition accomplished a journey of thirty-seven hundred miles, nine hundred of which was by land, and twelve hundred by water in open boats, besides surveying and marking three hundred and fifty-eight miles of the boundary-line.

The topographical parties have been continuously in the field, both winter and summer, from the 1st of June, 1873, until the present time, with the exception of two months in the spring of 1874. They have demonstrated by experience that instrumental work can be done in that high latitude, even in the most rigorous part of the winter, where the country is wooded. On the open plains such exposure would be, beyond question, exceedingly dangerous.

The limits of this report will allow only a very brief statement of the general character of the country passed over.

That portion crossed by the part of the line surveyed during the present year was found to be an open plain entirely destitute of timber, but easily practicable for wagon-trains, except in the vicinity of Frenchman's Creek and the crossing of Milk River, where wide detours had to be made to avoid the Bad Lands.

From longitude 106° to the crossing of Milk River the country cannot be called attractive. The rain-fall is small, and water consequently scarce during the summer months. The soil is alkaline, and produces mostly sage-brush and cactus.

From the Sweet Grass Hills to the Rocky Mountains its character is entirely changed. The rain-fall appears to be ample. The belt along the foot of the mountains, in addition to scenery of rare beauty, presents to the eye of the practical man the more solid advantage of an unsurpassed fertility. Northwestern Montana is still the range of immense herds of buffaloes, whose numbers, contrary to the commonly received opinion, are constantly increasing. This region is the country of the Blackfoot and Piegan tribes of Indians. It is also the debatable ground of the North Assiniboines, the Gros Ventres of the Prairie, and the River Crows, while an occasional war-party of Sioux may be found as far northwest as the Sweet Grass Hills. With the exception of the Sioux, these tribes appear to be peaceably enough disposed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. J. TWINING,
Capt. Engineers, Chief Astronomer.

ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, ESQ.,
Commissioner Northern Boundary.

		1873.
689	Mr. Fish to Admiral Polo...	Nov. 12	Has received intelligence of the shooting of fifty-three persons, taken from the Virginus; the story too shocking and cruel to be credible. Asks if he has more authentic intelligence.	977
690	Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish...	Nov. 12	Has received no information	978
691	Copies of telegrams to Admiral Polo. [Handed by Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish, November 15.]	Nov. 15	Papers of Virginus irregular; order from Madrid did not reach Santiago in time to stay executions, owing to destruction of telegraph-wires; the Virginus a pirate.	978
692	Copies of telegrams to Admiral Polo. [Handed by Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish, November 17.]	Nov. 17	Spain cannot adopt a final resolution until all the facts are known.	978
693	Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish..	Nov. 18	Inclosing copy of a telegraphic dispatch from the minister of state at Madrid, in which it is said that Spain cannot answer till the facts are known, and is resolved to preserve the integrity of its territory, but will observe the obligations of international law and the letters of all treaties.	979
694	Telegram from the Secretary of State, Madrid, to Admiral Polo. (Handed to Mr. Fish by Admiral Polo.)	Nov. 20	Proposing an arbitration, and the surrender of the vessel into the hands of the arbitrators; the authority of Spain is respected in Cuba; the evidence is conflicting; this is a reason for arbitration; Spain is acting in good faith.	980
695	Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish...	Nov. 20	Inclosing copy of telegram from minister of state, in which it is said that Spanish authority is respected in Cuba; peremptory orders issued.	980
696	Interview between Admiral Polo and Mr. Fish.	Nov. 21	Mr. Fish declines to submit to arbitration the question of an indignity to the flag; is willing to submit all questions which are properly subjects of reference; is surprised to find no expression from Spain of disapproval of the hasty executions, or of readiness to release the vessel and survivors; arbitration would be postponement; it is desirable to have the settlement complete before assembling of Congress. The United States strongly desires a friendly settlement.	981
697	Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish...	Nov. 23	Notifying him when and where the testimony of Greenwood and other witnesses will be taken.	982
698	do.....	Nov. 23	Inclosing telegram from Madrid that the reported hostile manifestations against General Sickles are not true.	982

699	Mr. Fish to Admiral Polo...	Nov. 24	Respecting the proposed examination of witnesses in New York.	983
700	Telegram from the secretary of state, Madrid, to Admiral Polo. (Handed by Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish.)	Nov. 24	Asking whether the United States will await the result of investigation by Spain; whether the President will submit question to Congress; and for a statement of points of offense in view of treaty stipulations and international law.	983
701	Memorandum of statement by Mr. Fish to Admiral Polo.	Nov. 24	Reasons why it is impracticable to wait; reasons why President must submit facts to Congress. General statement of the points of offense.	984
702	Telegram from secretary of state, Madrid, to Admiral Polo. (Handed by Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish.)	Nov. 25	The news contradictory as to right of Virginus to carry United States flag; it may appear that she is the subject of reclamations against United States; Spain suspends her reclamations, and asks United States to do the same, till facts are known; no satisfaction possible till right to demand it established.	984
703	Memorandum of interview between Mr. Fish and Admiral Polo.	Nov. 25	Admiral Polo reads No. 702; Mr. Fish replies that United States, in the interest of all maritime powers, (including Spain,) deny right of capture of documented vessels on high seas in time of peace; the right to inquire into validity of papers is in the power issuing them, which the United States are prepared to do; the United States will consider the subject of reclamations when the honor of the flag is atoned for; the identity of the Virginus unquestioned; any irregularity in papers, therefore, merely technical.	985
704	do.....	Nov. 27	Mr. Fish reads dispatch from General Sickles; (See No. 651 supra ;) says the United States cannot accept this proposal; this communication is made to Admiral Polo because it is supposed General Sickles has left Madrid; the proposition is virtually that Spain should hold the vessel while seeking proof to justify her capture. Admiral Polo asks whether, if the vessel be given up, inquiries would be instituted by the United States, with a view to punishment of any who might be found to have violated the laws of United States, reserving question of salute for further information; Mr. Fish consults the President and accepts proposal; if vessel and survivors are delivered forthwith, the salute will be dispensed with, if Spain, before December 25, satisfies the United States that the Virginus had no right to carry the flag; in that case proceedings will be commenced by United States against vessel and persons implicated; but Spain is also to proceed in accordance with the second proposition to General Sickles.	986
705	Telegram from secretary of state, Madrid, to Admiral Polo. (Handed to Mr. Fish by Admiral Polo.)	Nov. 28	Negotiations renewed in Madrid; any arrangements made will be carried out in Cuba.	987
706	do.....	Nov. 28	Expressing satisfaction at happy termination of negotiations.	987
707	Protocol of conference between Mr. Fish and Admiral Polo.	Nov. 29	Carrying out the agreement stated in No. 704.....	987
708	Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish...	Dec. 1	Has not yet received his instructions for naming time and place for surrender; expects them every moment; asks, therefore, for extension of time.	988
709	Mr. Fish to Admiral Polo...	Dec. 2	Delay appears unavoidable, and will doubtless cease in a few hours; the President will then rely upon immediate execution of agreement.	989
710	do.....	Dec. 4	Is informed by General Sickles that powers have been sent to Admiral Polo; is prepared to execute the agreement, and asks him to name an hour to-day when he will meet Mr. Fish for that purpose.	989
711	Admiral Polo to Mr. Fish...	Dec. 4	In reply to the last; his powers require him to act in conjunction with superior authorities of Cuba; has referred the subject to Madrid.	989
712	Agreement between Mr. Fish and Admiral Polo.	Dec. 8	As to time, place, and manner of surrender of vessel and survivors, and as to mode of rendering salute, if not dispensed with.	990

The first of these was the discovery of the circulation of the blood by William Harvey in 1628. This discovery was a major breakthrough in the history of medicine, as it established the fact that the blood is constantly circulating throughout the body. Harvey's discovery was based on his observations of the heart and the blood vessels, and his experiments with animals. He showed that the heart pumps blood out to the rest of the body, and that the blood returns to the heart through the veins. This discovery was a major step forward in the understanding of the human body, and it paved the way for the development of modern medicine.

Another major discovery in the history of medicine was the discovery of the germ theory of disease by Louis Pasteur in 1861. This discovery established the fact that many diseases are caused by microorganisms, and it paved the way for the development of vaccines and antibiotics. Pasteur's discovery was based on his experiments with the fermentation of wine and the spoilage of food. He showed that the microorganisms that cause these processes are also the ones that cause disease. This discovery was a major step forward in the understanding of the causes of disease, and it paved the way for the development of modern medicine.

The discovery of the structure of DNA by James Watson and Francis Crick in 1953 was another major breakthrough in the history of medicine. This discovery established the fact that DNA is the genetic material of all living organisms, and it paved the way for the development of modern genetics. Watson and Crick's discovery was based on their experiments with X-ray diffraction and the chemical structure of DNA. They showed that DNA is a double helix, and that the sequence of the bases in the DNA molecule determines the genetic code. This discovery was a major step forward in the understanding of the genetic code, and it paved the way for the development of modern genetics.

PROCLAMATION, ETC.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas by the thirty-third article of a treaty concluded at Washington on the 8th day of May, 1871, between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, it was provided that "Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of this treaty, shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the legislature of Prince Edward's Island, on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States, on the other;"

And whereas it is provided by Article XXXII of the treaty aforesaid "that the provisions and stipulations of articles XVIII to XXV of this treaty, inclusive, shall extend to the colony of Newfoundland, so far as they are applicable. But if the Imperial Parliament, the legislature of Newfoundland, or the Congress of the United States, shall not embrace the colony of Newfoundland in their laws enacted for carrying the foregoing articles into effect, then this article shall be of no effect; but the omission to make provision by law to give it effect, by either of the legislative bodies aforesaid, shall not in any way impair any other articles of this treaty;"

And whereas by the second section of an act entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, relating to the fisheries," it is provided;

"That whenever the colony of Newfoundland shall give its consent to the application of the stipulations and provisions of the said articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth of said treaty, inclusive, to that colony, and the legislature thereof and the Imperial Parliament shall pass the necessary laws for that purpose, the above-enumerated articles, being the produce of the fisheries of the colony of Newfoundland, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, from and after the date of a proclamation by the President of the United States declaring that he has satisfactory evidence that the said colony of Newfoundland has consented, in a due and proper manner, to have the provisions of the said articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth inclusive of the said treaty extended to it, and to allow the United States the full benefits of all the stipulations therein contained, and shall be so admitted free of duty so long as the said articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth, inclusive, and article thirtieth of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of article thirty-third of said treaty;"

And whereas the Secretary of State of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Washington have recorded, in a protocol of a conference held by them at the Department of State in Washington on the 28th day of May, 1874, in the following language:

“Protocol of a conference held at Washington on the twenty-eighth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four.”

“Whereas it is provided by Article XXXII of the treaty between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, signed at Washington on the 8th of May, 1871, as follows :

“‘ARTICLE XXXII.

“‘It is further agreed, that the provisions and stipulations of Articles XVIII to XXV of this treaty, inclusive, shall extend to the colony of Newfoundland, so far as they are applicable. But if the Imperial Parliament, the legislature of Newfoundland, or the Congress of the United States, shall not embrace the colony of Newfoundland in their laws enacted for carrying the foregoing articles into effect, then this article shall be of no effect ; but the omission to make provision by law to give it effect, by either of the legislative bodies aforesaid, shall not in any way impair any other articles of this treaty ;’

“And whereas an act was passed by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, and approved on the first day of March, 1873, by the President of the United States, entitled ‘An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the eighth of May, 1871, relating to fisheries,’ by which act it is provided :

“‘Section 2. That whenever the colony of Newfoundland shall give its consent to the application of the stipulations and provisions of the said articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth of said treaty, inclusive, to that colony, and the legislature thereof and the Imperial Parliament shall pass the necessary laws for that purpose, the above-enumerated articles, being the produce of the fisheries of the colony of Newfoundland, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty from and after the date of a proclamation by the President of the United States, declaring that he has satisfactory evidence that the said colony of Newfoundland has consented, in a due and proper manner, to have the provisions of the said articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth, inclusive, of the said treaty extended to it, and to allow the United States the full benefits of all the stipulations therein contained, and shall be so admitted free of duty, so long as the said articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth, inclusive, and article thirtieth, of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of article thirty-third of said treaty ;’

“And whereas an act was passed by the governor, legislative council, and assembly of Newfoundland, in legislative session convened, in the thirty-seventh year of Her Majesty’s reign, and assented to by Her Majesty on the twelfth day of May, 1874, intituled ‘An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty of Washington as far as they relate to this colony :’

“The undersigned, Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, and the Right Honorable Sir Edward Thornton, one of Her Majesty’s most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath, Her Britannic Majesty’s envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America, duly authorized for this purpose by their respective governments, having met together at Washington, and having found that the laws required to carry the Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Articles XXX and XXXII, of the treaty aforesaid, into operation, have been passed by the Congress of the United States on the one part, and by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the legislature of Prince Edward’s Island and the legislature of Newfoundland on the other, hereby declare that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, of the treaty between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty shall take effect, in accordance with Article XXXIII of said treaty, between the citizens of the United States of America and Her Majesty’s subjects in the colony of Newfoundland on the first day of June next.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Buenos Ayres, September 12th, 1873. (Received Oct. 22.)

SIR: An attempt to assassinate the President of this Republic was recently made, the assassins firing upon him while passing through the streets in his carriage at 9 o'clock in the evening. He escaped unhurt, however, and the men who made the attempt, two Italians, (brothers, by the name of Guerri,) were arrested, one of them confessing their guilt and stating that they were employed by a person unknown to them.

It is the general belief that the crime was instigated by persons concerned in the rebellion in Entre Rios.

Shortly after the occurrence, I called upon the President and officially congratulated him upon his escape. He expressed the opinion that the attempt was dictated by the malice of "anti-progresistas"—men who are opposed to the general education of the people and their advancement in civilization, the energetic advocacy of which has rendered him obnoxious to this class; but felicitated himself upon the progress already made, and the certainty of the complete triumph of this essential principle of republicanism, which the death of no one man could materially retard.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Buenos Ayres, June 13, 1874. (Received July 21.)

SIR: The presidential electors chosen at the late election by the people of the several provinces, met on yesterday for the purpose of casting their ballots for President and Vice-President of the Argentine Republic. In this province (Buenos Ayres) the most important and most populous, the votes of the electors were for General Bartolome Mitre for President and Señor Torrent for Vice-President. No dispatches have yet been received of the result in the other provinces, but it is generally conceded that Don Nicholas Avellaneda for President and Don Mariano Acosta for Vice-President, have obtained a large majority of the electoral vote.

and are elected. The friends of General Mitre claim that frauds of the most gigantic character were practiced by the party of the successful candidate, and some of his partisans and newspaper organs have been making suggestions of resistance and revolution if the result should be against him; but I do not think they will attempt to put their threats into execution. It is understood that the present administration (President Sarmiento) is favorable to the claims of Señor Avellaneda, and he would, of course, exercise the entire power of the government to put down any disorder which might arise. The papers this morning mention rumors of a popular disturbance in the province of "Entre Rios," but it is not generally credited. It is not probable that General Mitre will do anything to aggravate or encourage the bad temper which may now exist; and as the President-elect does not assume the office until next October, all excitement will doubtless be subdued long before that time.

It has been suggested to me that General Mitre is favorable to a peaceful solution of the present diplomatic misunderstanding between Brazil and the Argentine Republic, and that Señor Avellaneda is the candidate of the war party, but I have not been able, thus far, to find any substantial foundation for the statement.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Buenos Ayres, July 10, 1874. (Received August 20.)

SIR: The ninety-eighth anniversary of the Independence of the United States was recognized and observed at this legation on the 4th instant.

The legation was thrown open at 2 p. m., and a reception, given by the minister-resident, was attended by President Sarmiento in person, accompanied by his cabinet-ministers and justices of the supreme court; by ex-President General Mitre and the President-elect, Dr. Avellaneda; by a large number of senators and deputies of the National Congress; by the governor of the province of Buenos Ayres, and his staff; by the entire diplomatic and consular corps, and many prominent native citizens, as well as the American residents here.

The Argentine Republic having paid distinguished honors to our national anniversary, not only by the presence of his excellency the President, and their excellencies the several ministers of state and justice, at this legation, but also by the adjournment of the National Congress and the supreme court for the day; by saluting our flag with twenty-one guns; by flying the Argentine flag from the public buildings, and by giving other evidences of friendship and good-will toward the United States, I had the honor to request by note the commander, Captain Mahan, of the United States steamer "Wasp," if consistent with the rules and regulations of the Navy Department, to cause a proper salute to be given by his guns to the Argentine flag on the 9th instant, which is known as the "independence day" of the Argentine Republic. The request was complied with for the reasons set forth in his reply to my note, copies of which I have the honor to inclose.

As a further recognition of these manifestations of good-will toward the United States a note of acknowledgment and thanks was promptly addressed to the minister of foreign affairs.

I have the honor also to inclose herewith paragraphs from the leading newspapers of this city noticing the anniversary and its observance.

I am, &c.,

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Buenos Ayres, July 4, 5 p. m., 1874.

SIR: The Argentine Republic having paid distinguished honors to our national anniversary, not only by the presence of his excellency the President and their excellencies the several ministers of state and justice at this legation to-day, but also by the adjournment of the National Congress and supreme court of justice; by saluting our flag with guns; by flying the Argentine flag from the public buildings, and by giving other evidences of fraternity, friendship, and cordial good-will toward the United States Government, I have the honor to request, if consistent with the rules and regulations of the Naval Department, that you cause a proper salute to be given by your guns to the Argentine flag on the 9th instant, which is known as the "independence day" of the Argentine Republic.

UNITED STATES STEAMER "WASP," (4th rate,)
Buenos Ayres, July 6, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 4th instant requesting me to salute the Argentine flag on the 9th of July, for the reasons you specify. In reply I have to say that, while I desire to manifest by every means in my power the friendly feeling of our Government to that of the Argentine Republic, the fact of their courteous salute to our flag on the 4th of July would not alone be sufficient to justify my disregarding my general instructions and the custom that vessels with the small armament of the Wasp do not salute.

The same courtesy of a salute on the 4th of July has been paid by the government of Uruguay and not returned by this vessel.

The unusual compliment paid by the President of the Argentine Republic, and other high officials, attending your reception at the United States legation in order to express his sympathies with our nation appears, however, to justify a departure from ordinary rules, and, in acknowledgment of the distinguished honor thus paid to us, I shall be happy to comply with your request.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. T. MAHAN,
Commanding United States Steamer Wasp.

General T. O. OSBORN,
United States Minister Resident.

THE AMERICAN RECEPTION.

The "reunion" yesterday at the United States legation was brilliant and numerously attended. Among those present were President Sarmiento, Dr. Frias, prime minister; Dr. Avellaneda, General Mitre, Dr. Rawson, Hon. Lionel Sackville West, H. B. M. envoy extraordinary; M. Ducros Aubert, French plenipotentiary; M. Peralta, Spanish minister; Dr. Alvear, Mr. F. St. John, Mr. Posadas, postmaster-general of the republic; Colonel Peña, General Meyer, Comendador Fleury, Captain Mahan, and officers of the United States steamer "Wasp," the Commander of the Spanish gunboat, Sr. Lamarca, sub-secretary of foreign affairs; Mr. Cristofersen, Swedish consul-general; Mr. Carranza, Bolivian consul-general; Mr. R. Bridgett, H. M. acting consul; Messrs. Daniel Gowland, Coffin, Goschen, Guido, Mulhall, Hopkins, Folmar, Meeks, Speare, Benton, Rev. Dr. Jackson, Mitre-Vedia, Negrotto, Cathcart, Naulty, Passman, the consuls of Germany, Denmark, Switzerland, Italy, and about one hundred other gentlemen.

General Osborn, assisted by his secretary, Mr. Bowers, and the United States consul, Mr. Baker, received his guests in the handsome suite of saloons forming the American legation, which were tastefully decorated for the occasion. The portrait of Washington was hung between the American and Argentine flags, and the tables were laid out with wine and lunch.

When President Sarmiento arrived, accompanied by the cabinet ministers, in the state carriage, which was followed by the President's body-guard, the saloons were already crowded and presented a gay appearance. General Osborn wore plain evening-dress. The American and other officers were en grande tenue. Nothing could be more cordial than the congratulations of President Sarmiento and the various European plenipotentiaries to the American minister, as well as of the leading Argentine and other visitors.

General Osborn, standing next the President of the republic, saluted the assembly in the following speech:

"Friends and fellow-countrymen: On this anniversary I have much to say to you, but all is contained in the one word, 'welcome!'"

It has been the custom for years to celebrate this anniversary at home and abroad, for it was declared that this day should be kept in all time as one of rejoicing and congratulation.

"And posterity will celebrate this day. Upon the annual return of this glorious, immortal day, they will celebrate it with thanksgiving, with festivities, and with prayer. It may be they will shed tears, but not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but in exultation of gratitude and of great joy."

"This is the prophecy that was made at one of the most critical periods in the early history of our people, at a most awful and momentous period to them, when the present was full of doubt and a dark mantle was upon the future; when no bright and guiding star had yet appeared; when naught but a faint and glimmering hope gleamed upon their dark and dangerous pathway. But it was uttered by one who with a strong heart and a steady nerve dared to lift the veil. And he said, 'I see!' And close upon the future, with a prophetic eye, he saw a young republic. Up to this hour, that prophecy has been verified; thus far it has been fulfilled; ninety and eight times has the earth performed her journey around the sun, and upon the annual return of this day the booming of cannon, the displays of the Stars and Stripes, herald its approach; and Americans everywhere meet, as we to-day, to do it honor. This is the day we celebrate, for it was made glorious, not by the birth of a king or an emperor, made sacred, not by crowns or scepters, but by the declaration of that truth, that men, rational and intelligent, were capable of self-government. It was made glorious by the pen of patriots, and holy by the hand of death. Eight and ninety years ago to-day the beautiful sentiments in our Declaration of Independence passed into the unbending text of organic law. Then we were comparatively weak; to-day the republic is strong. Then her flag was almost friendless upon the sea and land; to-day she can rally more than forty millions round her standard. Then civilization was creeping slowly up the Alleghany Mountains; to-day her brow is bathed in the waters of the Pacific.

"We should not forget that this day, in 1776, was devoted to discussion and reflection. A deliberative body, that gave out a larger influence, perhaps, to the political world than any other assemblage that ever convened, was in session. A few words of warning, a few words of caution, portraying the rashness of the attempt to sever the ties that bound America to the mother country; a few appeals to the remembrance that no oppression, save that of taxation without representation, had been imposed; a few appeals to the recollection that both countries spoke a common language, had a common literature and a common ancestry; a few expressions concerning the beauty and holiness of peace and the horrors of war, but all in vain; and then carried along on the irresistible surges of the coming revolution, rose up speakers saying sentences sparkling with the love of freedom, breaking out with fierce invectives against the wrong of taxation without representation, painting the happiness and glories of a free country in that glad and happy future we have lived to see; next, a few names to a piece of parchment, and the work of the day was over, and every man who took the pen was a free-man or a traitor.

"But the deed was done, yet the work of seven long years was to be accomplished. But those who dared to proclaim dared to maintain.

"The Revolution was in no sense the work of a few orators and writers; the military achievements were not altogether due to the foresight and ability of a few generals; the great mass of the American people bore its burden upon their own shoulders. The political force of the Declaration arises from the fact that it was the utterance of a people who glorified what they said by doing it, who made vital living truths the basis of national action, who gave to their country not only the proclamation of freedom, but freedom itself.

"My countrymen, I have no time to-day to lead you back into the shadow of a century, and wander with you over the battle-grounds whereon the champions of the Revolution contended. Why should I? You have often, if not in person, in your imagination, lingered near their battle-fields where they shared with each other the terrors of Trenton, the carnage of Brandywine, the frost and cold of Valley Forge, and left their bloody foot-prints upon the banks of the Delaware. It is and ever has been the policy of our Government, and history tells it, as that of peace and non-interference with other governments, no entangling alliances with or against any government on earth. Prosperity and happiness to all governments and their peoples, and the right to work out her own destiny, is her motto. And yet it is true she turns some of the pages in her history that are written in her own blood. Every nation has its critical period. That period came to our country when it seemed that wrong and oppression combined to stop the advancing spirit of the age; when some of her own children undertook to sustain wrong by age, error by custom, and oppression by the past. The house could not stand thus divided; but, 'with charity for all and with malice toward none,' the republic repelled the first assault and thundered from the lips of Union guns, the field trembled, a world was startled, and republics were put to the test. In magnitude and force it was a grand rebellion. In numbers and power, in determination and boldness, it challenges the world. Yet our colleges, and universities, and common schools had done their work too well to be finally defeated, for they not only disciplined men, but they made patriots, for wherever was found the patriot's heart was found the patriot's steel.

"The time did come, and it is past, thank God, when wrong and oppression rendered it necessary for her in self-defense to invoke the arbitrament of force and arms to protect and settle questions of political rights, yet the truth of freedom did shine out resplendently from the smoke of her battle-fields and completely wipe out the 'sum of all villainies.' To-day the republic is a unit, and her future does not depend upon the arms as her prowess, for the last great disturbing element has passed from her; but rather in a clear sense of her dependence as a people upon the everlasting principles of truth, right, and liberty, and a reverent recognition of God as the arbiter and controller of our national destiny.

"My countrymen, while our people at home have but one common country, one grand temple of freedom, but one altar, around which they all gather to-day to stir the fires, light their sacrifices, and are always ready for the time of action, you are some six thousand miles away assembled at this legation in the capital of this grand sister republic. I know you feel almost at home. Then in your name, in the name of our republic, to these her friends I say, hail! and welcome! And in honor of this day we celebrate, I give to you, the President of the Argentine Republic, the republic of South America, and to the President of the United States, the republic of North America."

President Sarmiento then replied in the following speech, which he read in Spanish:

"Sr. Minister: When your excellency may read the debates of our congress, the messages of the executive, or the tendency and spirit of its acts, you will find that there is a family link; that there is a political doctrine that makes a single people of the whole continent which Columbus added to the general civilization of the world.

"The 4th of July is for us the completion of the conquest which humanity achieved in 1494. The rejoicing shade of Columbus hung on that day over the august heads of those that signed the act of Independence.

"We also were there, as there are in the buds and flowers of the trees, present until the consummation of the centuries, the future and successive generations of plants that have to represent the species in the magnificent drama of the development of the plan of the creation, as well in the physical as in the moral.

"On the 9th of July our fathers reproduced the second edition of the same act as yours of the 4th, and sixty years after we meet together reunited here, under the shade of our respective flags, to congratulate each other upon having passed safely through all human vicissitudes, through the various difficulties that we have encountered on the road, and now rejoice that while the old political world vacillates upon its foundations, the new, in these our two countries, under the protection of an identical constitution, reposes tranquil in the well-regulated activity of the hive without a queen, but with a government that directs or limits the beneficent action of the social force; that is, the executive power.

"Macaulay, in finishing the history of the struggle with the last of the Stuarts, and Bancroft, on prefacing thirteen volumes of the History of the United States, said we did not make a revolution, but preserved untouched the legacy of the British liberties, opposing the pretensions of the Crown that tried to go beyond the royal prerogative power.

"But with Independence we made a revolution, by creating the executive department strong and limited, sufficient to resist invasion or anarchy, and yet flexible enough to avoid collision with any liberty of action or of thought.

"We had not a foreigner's guide to traverse a new and intricate way.

"Europe could not furnish it to us. It was "the blind leading the blind." We found it in your constitution, and, strange to say, anarchy and the spirit of order, tyranny and liberty, ambition and thought, all conformed to this standard that seemed suitable to all. Thus was first formed the confederation of provincial petty tyrants, then the federation, and at last the Union, as you call it, which is the period we are now passing through in the same way as the aquatic or amphibious monsters preceded the development of life until coming to man endowed with intelligence, which discovers the unchangeable laws of nature and puts them as the basis of his institutions. I do not know if there are still surviving beings, animated with the appetites and passions of an epoch which has passed away, but you may observe by our struggles of thought and words that the whole question reduces itself to discover the mode of making practical and effective a constitution which we have adopted, and having all of us for our guide your public writers and commentators.

"By that way we shall arrive at port; for it is true that in the uncertainties of ideas, in the conflict of opinions, we know where we are traveling to. Not all the nations of the world can see clearly whither they point their steps, whether to a renewed past, or to an uncertain and obscure future.

"In 1810 we adhered to British liberties, purified by the republican institutions in America.

"In a century longer, those who talk that language, and those who rule themselves by its institutions in Europe, in America, in India, in Oceanica, we all shall form six hundred millions of free people, and the backward of the whole of mankind will come to join us from all parts, and I have great pleasure in calling all present to join me in the toast, 'To the 4th of July, to the United States of both Americas, to your country, Mr. Minster, and to your President's health!'"

General Osborn having proposed the memory of Washington and San Martin, the founders of American and Argentine independence, Dr. Rawson replied: "Your excellency has signally flattered us by placing our hero side by side with Washington. Yet they were both workmen in the same cause; both labored to establish principles of freedom. Washington proclaimed to the universe that all men were born with the right to make their own laws and follow their own form of religion, and this declaration was borne on the wings of the American eagle to the ends of the earth. Some years later we caught up the doctrine, and bore it triumphantly across this continent to the victorious field of Ayacucho. On a day like this we have a community of glories; but I will not now talk of your 70,000 miles of railway, your canals, your increase of population, your power in war, your wisdom in peace, your distinguished men like Morse, the Columbus of electric science. All your glory is summed up in the name of the founder of your country, the man born for all time. Gentlemen, let us drink with enthusiasm the memory of Washington."

The next toast was "Prosperity to the Argentine Republic," coupled with the name of General Mitre, who replied: "The sentiment contained in this toast is for present and future ages, based on the grand dogma of liberty and equality. In celebrating the 4th of July, we can never forget the heroism of the signers of Independence, who with unshaken nerve affixed their names, and said, 'Now let King George hang us for rebels.' This day awakens different sentiments in various countries. In those where tyrants yet rule, it is a day of dread, for they know their death-warrant has gone forth. In lands where slaves yet breathe, it is looked forward to as a date of promise and delivery. But in the hearts and homes of free men all the world over, it is hailed with a burst of glorious celebration, such as we now see around us. May this 4th of July be regarded as the bright omen of the new world, a star leading the destinies of mankind to life, liberty, and progress."

The memory of Lincoln and Rivadavia was responded to by Rev. Mr. Jackson, who spoke feelingly of the visible interposition of Divine Providence in guiding the affairs of nations. Lincoln was an instrument of Heaven to wipe out the foul blot of slavery in North America. Rivadavia was a man of transcendent genius, sent to advance civilization in La Plata. The flag of the stars and stripes now floats over a people truly free. The star of the Argentine flag is undimmed in its horizon of blue and white.

The relations between the United States and La Plata was replied to by Mr. Hopkins in a powerful and argumentative speech. In 1818, the United States sent a commission to study the condition of the new republic of La Plata. In 1823, the first consul sent to Spanish America was to Buenos Ayres, because this city had first begun the struggle for independence. When the Holy Alliance at Aix la Chapelle was forging fetters for South America, by restoring to Spain her colonies, England and the United States refused, and Henry Clay was the first to recognize the young republic. But Rosas and General Jackson, each in his way, contributed to cut off relations between North and South. When Rosas fell the United States hastened to renew relations, the first treaty for opening the rivers being signed between General Urquiza and the United States minister. The first Argentine minister sent to Washington was Mr. Sarmiento, who found few people knew anything about Buenos Ayres. De Tocqueville, years ago, recommended Americans to cultivate closer relations with Spanish America. Grant is doing so; and many of our best writers and statesmen labored for this.

Washington Irving, Prescott, Motley, and Ticknor, by their writings; Gillies and Gould, by their astronomical labors; Stevens and Squires, by their explorations; Wheelwright, Meigs, and Church, by their enterprises; Monroe, Clay, Adams, and Webster, by their fearless enunciations of state policy—all helped toward drawing closer the republics of the new world. Some of them are backward, after fifty years of freedom, but did it not take Europe three hundred years to emerge from feudalism? We find republicans in every land in Europe, such as John Stuart Mill, Lamennais, Humboldt, and Arago, which shows how true principles make progress. Twenty years ago Kent and Story were unknown in Buenos Ayres; now every lawyer has them on his shelves. Let us labor to carry out the proposed line of steamers between United States and Buenos Ayres, and then our relations will be much closer.

Mr. Lamarca, of the foreign office, followed, and at 4.30 p. m. the President and many of the guests retired.

The popular toast of "The Ladies" was then proposed by Gen. Osborn, ably responded to by Mr. Yeatman; then came the toast of the "Army and Navy," and coupled with it "The Press," to which Mr. W. T. Cathcart (of the Daily News) replied in a brief manner.

We may mention that this year no invitations were sent to any person. It was merely made known that the saloons of the United States legation on the day in question were open for the reception by General Osborn of all true citizens, rich or poor, as also friends of the Union. A large assembly was the consequence of this open and free opportunity to celebrate an important day in the world's history.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Buenos Ayres, July 15, 1874. (Received August 20.)

SIR: The election of Dr. Don Nicholas Avellaneda as President of the Argentine Republic, and Don Mariano Acosta as vice-president, is the result of the ballots cast by the presidential electors chosen at the late election by the people of the several provinces.

It is claimed that frauds of the most serious character were practiced by the unsuccessful as well as by the successful party in the contest, but I learn from very good source that the authorities have eliminated the frauds practiced by both parties, and the result is still in favor of the parties above named. For the past ten days rumors of coming trouble and revolution have filled this city. A few nights ago the guards were doubled and the troops were put under arms, by reason of the fact that three thousand muskets were detected in the possession of one Caballos, said to be a Brazilian.

A regiment of troops from one of the upper provinces was at once ordered to the city, and the present administration seems determined to put down any disturbance which might arise. It is now claimed by the friends of the unsuccessful candidate in the late election, General Mitre, that Dr. Don Nicholas Avellaneda cannot be legally declared President from the fact that the constitution requires that a quorum of two-thirds of the national congress is requisite to perform that duty; and as the deputies of this province, Buenos Ayres, friends of General Mitre, are not permitted to take their seats, there will be no constitutional quorum of the national congress present to declare Avellaneda President.

It is claimed by the other side that the constitution requires only two-thirds of the members seated and present to make the proclamation.

This question may be made the pretext or basis of trouble and even revolution, but the future can only determine.

On the 30th of June last, two officers of a Brazilian gunboat in Alto Uruguay, landed at Argentine town, Alvear, were insulted, and the surgeon (one of the officers) was killed. The commander of the gunboat demanded the surrender of the assassin, which on being refused, fired on the town. The affair produced quite a sensation both in private and government circles. It is understood that several sharp notes passed between the minister for foreign affairs and the Brazilian minister on the subject, and resulted in the disapproval of the act of the commander of the gunboat by the Brazilian government and his dismissal from service.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Vienna, November 6, 1873. (Received December 8.)

SIR: The opening of the Austrian Reichsrath by the Emperor in person occurred yesterday with the usual formalities; and the ceremonial has attracted the greater interest from the fact that the present Reichsrath is the first where the members of the House of Deputies have been elected, not as formerly by the Diets, but directly by the people under the new electoral law, of whose provisions I had the honor of advising you by my No. 545, of the 18th of February. The speech of the Emperor, of which I will append a translation, was cordially received, and the closing passages were warmly cheered. His Majesty remarked that they were entering upon a new period of their constitutional life, on the basis of an independent representation, which would enable all parties to give full expression to their needs and their wishes; and he invoked their intelligent co-operation in aiding his government to develop the constitutional institutions of the empire, and to protect its unity and its strength without forgetting the interests of the various nationalities. Allusion was made to the financial crisis now prevailing from exaggerated values and an abuse of credit—for the redress of which measures would be proposed—and to bills which would be submitted for their consideration on the relation between the church and the state by reason of the dissolution of the concordat with the Holy See.

Stress was laid upon the necessity of establishing a constitutional judiciary, and of further provision respecting the service of the army.

A paragraph was devoted to the Universal Exhibition, which, despite of difficulties, had achieved a brilliant success; and which, exercising a beneficent influence upon the spiritual and economic life of peoples, tending to the development of civilization and of the spirit of invention, and to a just appreciation of honest labor, would be appreciated throughout the world, while it aroused pride and hope in all patriotic breasts. The visits of sovereigns far and near had strengthened the ties of friendship and augmented the guarantees of peace, while they had made more important the position of the monarchy in the concert of states.

The speech closed with an assurance that, amid vicissitudes and painful trials, Austria to-day found herself rejuvenated at home and commanding respect abroad; that in every domain of public life the barriers that restrained free movements had fallen, and they were on a path that would conduct them to a solution of their great task—the union of the people of Austria in a powerful state, guided by the ideas of right and of freedom.

To the accomplishment of that task, faithful to his motto, "Viribus unitis," he invoked their united efforts for the honor and safety of their dear Austria.

The applause at the conclusion of the address and as the Emperor retired, passing between the members of the two houses, who occupied the floor of the hall, was hearty and prolonged.

The newspapers this morning exhibit an unusual unanimity in the favorable view taken of the address.

The Fremdenblatt says:

Never did a speech from the throne bear testimony in a manner more clear and precise to the perfect accord of the sovereign with the principle and policy of his ministers. * * The Emperor has really pronounced in it noble and patriotic words, and in recognizing that his task as well as ours is to make Austria a powerful state based upon the ideas of right and of liberty, he has created so intimate an alliance with his peoples that it will survive all vicissitudes of time.

The New Free Press remarks that—

The discourse from the throne has produced an impression of profound satisfaction. The spirit that animates it is that of the modern ideas. * * * If the discourse proclaims as the task for all the living forces of the empire to make Austria a powerful state, based upon the ideas of right and of liberty, it is the erection, as it were, of two columns of Hercules, whose signal-lights will illuminate our whole public life. The discourse from the throne is a programme which the Reichsrath and the population may greet with acclamation. There is in it nothing obscure or unequivocal. It takes into serious consideration the real needs of the empire and the most pressing exigencies of liberty, and, above all, it is eminently fitted to awaken the hope of an understanding and of action simultaneous, harmonious, salutary, and beneficent between the government and the representation of the country.

The Morgen Post says that the words of the Emperor are like a ray of light which penetrates the dark clouds.

The Tagblatt says:

The words quoted from the discourse from the throne authorize us to assume that yesterday in the throne-hall the modern constitutional state has received a solemn consecration. The extraordinary character of the enunciations of yesterday do not admit of their acceptance as if they reflected in general only the opinions of the present ministry.

The Gazette Allemande says:

Over the new reforms which are in preparation, and which, for the most part, correspond with our exigencies, the sky expands without a cloud to disturb the peace—reflecting the wishes of all civilized people, and promising to preserve its serenity for some time at least—thanks to the real political necessities of the powers that control the situation.

The New Fremdenblatt, after remarking that it had often deplored and blamed the Auersperg ministry for not taking sufficient account of the passions of the masses, and forgetting that cold reasoning was not sufficient to move the large majority of a great people, says:

That the discourse from the throne of yesterday breathes for almost all of its parties warm and patriotic sentiments.

The Tages Presse expresses similar views.

The (old) Presse says :

Never, in truth, has a discourse from the throne recognized and indicated in a manner so beautiful and so noble the mission of this old empire.

The Vaterland, the organ of the federalists, who are opposed to the constitution, observes :

As to the discourse from the throne, elaborated by the Auersperg ministry, one may say that it is interesting from what it says and from what it omits to say. The partisans of the constitution have every reason to be enchanted with it.

The Volksfreund, the organ of the clericals, who have acted with the federalists constituting the party of the right, says that "the last days have showed a decomposition of the party of the right" from the refusal to appear in the Reichsrath of the Czecks and the Moravian catholic nationals. Among the absentees are to be counted also the Poles, who denounced the electoral law in advance as violating the guarantees given to the diet of Gallicia.

The Volksfreund, under these circumstances, invites the deputies opposed to the ministry to unite in forming a "catholic conservative party of the empire."

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE, APPEARING IN THE "MÉMOIRAL DIPLOMATIQUE."

[Translation.]

Speech of the Emperor at the opening of the Reichsrath, on the 3d November, 1873.

Honorable Gentlemen of both Houses of the Reichsrath :

With joy I see you assembled around my throne for the faithful performance of your duties as citizens, and I bid you welcome while I present my imperial greeting. A new epoch of our constitutional existence has been opened for the formation of the lower house. Through direct elections the representation of the empire has acquired its independence, and the ground has been erected upon which all parties may be enabled to express their claims and their desires.

It will now be your task, honorable gentlemen, to finish the edifice with refined wisdom upon the foundation obtained, and to provide, in union with my government, for the maintenance and development of our constitutional institutions.

Without trespassing upon the guaranteed rights of the various countries of the monarchy, you will develop the unity and the might of the empire without neglecting the interests of the different races ; you will satisfy the requirements of the state ; and you will consecrate all your endeavors to the great and difficult problems for the successful solution of which I appeal to your intelligent aid.

In this manner, thanks to a gradual advance and to diligent labor, you will reach the desired point, where, by unanimous care for the interest, both of the united, as well as individual portions of the empire, and by affection for a common country, differences of opinion will disappear and interior tranquillity will be founded upon a durable foundation.

To a period of national economic elevation has succeeded one of those reverses which occur from time to time in the existence of nations as a consequence of the hasty and exaggerated employment of financial means and credit. My government has endeavored, within the limits traced by the laws, and by its own responsibility, to preserve as far as possible commerce and industry from the pernicious consequences of this disturbance of confidence. The measures which have been taken for this purpose will be immediately submitted to your constitutional deliberations.

My government will propose to you at the same time measures adapted to sustain confidence, to secure the national activity from serious disturbances, and to replace the domestic relations upon a firm basis.

In the draught of the budget which will be submitted to you you will find those principles of economy realized which should be rigorously followed in order to maintain the finances of the government in a satisfactory condition. In order to realize the urgent reform of the system of direct taxes there will be presently submitted to you a series of draughts of laws; also, in the matter of indirect taxes, your aid will be required in the matter of different laws, of which the draughts have been prepared.

The approaching expiration of the charter of the National Bank renders it necessary to regulate for the future the condition of this institution, and to take such measures as may be necessary to attain the important regulation of the valuta.

In order to adapt economical legislation to the requirements of the period, my government is engaged in preparing draughts of laws relative to shares and to the stock-exchange; also to the exercise of industry and to railways, as well as to the advancements of natural progress.

The draughts of laws necessary for filling the gaps which the abolition of the convention made with the Papal state has produced in the legislation relative to the relations between the Catholic Church and my government will be presently submitted to you.

My government considers one of its most important tasks to be the reform of criminal law, of civil procedure, and of judicial re-organization which is connected with it. The present condition of these labors of my government induces me to hope that you will succeed in shortly terminating the work so important, for the purpose of assuring, simplifying, and accelerating the administration of justice.

The draught of a law for the creation of an administrative court of justice, which could not be discussed during the preceding session, will now be submitted to your constitutional examination. My government will present a series of draughts of laws relative to the pensions of invalids, to the quartering of troops, to the organization and use of the armed civil force.

Notwithstanding the difficulties with which the exposition had to struggle, this great enterprise has had a brilliant career, and it has been universally appreciated; its salutary influence on the intellectual and economic existence of nations, on the progress of civilization, on the encouragement of the spirit of invention, and of industrial activity, as well as on the respect due to honest labor, will be gratefully regarded in all parts of the world. With fullest satisfaction I may therefore say, that in this pacific tournament we have contended with honor, and have obtained a success which must fill every patriotic heart with pride and with hope.

The visits paid to me during the Universal Exposition by the sovereigns of states, remote and near, have secured more closely the bonds of friendship with these empires; they have augmented the guarantees of peace, and the influence of monarchy in the government of nations.

Honorable Gentlemen of both Houses of the Reichsrath:

After various vicissitudes and disastrous struggles, Austria is to-day renovated at home, while she commands respect abroad. In all branches of public life, the causes which interfered with free movement have been suppressed, and we have entered upon those ways which conduct to the solution of the grand problem, the union of the various populations of Austria; the establishment of a powerful state conducted by sentiments of right and of liberty. Let us labor, gentlemen, in this task, faithful to my motto, (Viribus unilis), and let us join our efforts in a spirit of concord for the honor and prosperity of our beloved Austria.

SIR: I have to acknowledge your circular of the 3d December, marked "confidential," transmitting the President's message and the accompanying protocol touching the Virginus.

As I have before remarked, the attention which the text of the message would otherwise claim at Vienna, is in great part forestalled by the summary by cable given in the London Times, and reproduced by the continental press.

The New Free Press had a leading article this morning on the new phase of the Virginus question presented by the announcement that the United States had recognized the soundness of the view presented by Spain that she was not entitled to carry the American flag.

The article, while attributing the decision of the Government on this point not to the Attorney-General, but to the House of Representatives, and exhibiting, perhaps, in one or two other particulars, the carelessness and inexactness of statement to which you adverted in your No. 282, as marking a letter I had sent you from the columns of the same journal, exhibits a spirit of appreciation of the moderation and justice shown by us toward a sister republic in this matter, which I think deserving of notice, despite a few inaccuracies of form and an apparent ignorance of the terms of the protocol.

I append a translation of some brief extracts, which will show the spirit of the article on this point, as well as the appeal to Mr. Castelar, at the close, to extend to the Spanish prisoners in Cuba the rights of belligerents.

LEADING EDITORIAL ON "VIRGINIUS QUESTION."

[Translated from the "New Free Press."]

* * * The matter was no more examined in the newspaper columns, or in stormy assemblies convoked for the occasion, but in the Hall of Representatives, not by wildly excited masses, but by considerate politicians. Public opinion had first called for war, afterward for unconditional satisfaction. Now, satisfaction had been given, the passions had subsided, and the Congress weighed the matter slowly and considerately, and lo! what was most unexpected occurred. The Congress acknowledged that the Virginius had wrongfully carried the American flag, and it possessed the courage and honesty, not only openly to confess it, but officially to communicate to the Spanish government the surprising result of their consultations. This conduct deserves unreserved approval. As we were obliged to find, in the former phases of the "Virginus question," the procedure of the United States harsh and unjust, we must now pay our tribute to the self-knowledge, the sincere explanation of the Congress. Nothing is more difficult than the confession of being in the wrong. Even an individual with difficulty makes up his mind so far to overcome vanity and self-love; nations and states, as a rule, prefer sacrificing their goods and lives to saying to an injured neighbor, we were in the wrong. Such a step as that of the American Congress could not at all be imagined in a monarchical state. Here the foreign policy does not rest with the legislative body; this is subject neither to their direction nor supervision. * *

This is seemingly an abandonment of a success attained, but, in truth, a victory worth as much as any gained in the open field, and not less honorable.

* * * Would it not be more humane, and, perhaps, more wise, to grant to the Cuban insurgents the same rights as have been granted long ago to the Carlists in the mother country? Cowards, who are afraid of bullets, are far from combating in the ranks of the Cuban insurgents; executions do not cause any fear, but only unquenchable thirst for revenge, which is very often reeked in a dreadful manner on the Spanish soldiers. If Castelar resolved to utter the great words, "captured Cubans are to be spared like captured Carlists," his name would perhaps shine more purely and brilliantly than hitherto in the history of his native country, and the Virginus question would find a conclusion conciliatory and worthy of his country.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Vienna, December 26, 1873. (Received January 15, 1874.)

SIR: In my No. 683, acknowledging your confidential circular in regard to the affair of the Virginus, I appended an extract from some comments of the New Free Press upon the subject, which, while showing a high appreciation of the fairness exhibited by the Government at Washington, exhibited also some inaccuracies of facts due, perhaps, in part to the telegraph.

The New Free Press, in a second article on the subject, remarks: "The Virginius affair has, in its further course, been exactly developed according to the protocol lately communicated by us, which has been signed by the American minister, Fish, and the Spanish ambassador, Don Polo de Bernabé. * * They have proceeded on both sides in the case, move by move, as promptly as in a game of chess. Now, according to the same protocol, there has been instituted a trial of the surviving prisoners. Spain at the same time has bound herself in the same protocol to examine on her part whether the action of the authorities at Santiago has been in strict accordance with the Spanish laws, or with her international duties of the two parties. As it is announced, the honesty of the American Congress, who declare their own state to be in the wrong, caused great satisfaction in Madrid and in the Havana. This can, perhaps, lead to a more intimate friendship between the two reconciled republics; so much the more as Castelar, altogether a pure character, is just the statesman to make a wise and moderate use of his moral victory."

As far as I have had an opportunity of judging, the course of the United States in the matter thus far commands general approval. I have been congratulated on the wisdom, moderation, and success with which the affair has been managed under difficulties of peculiar delicacy. The further development and conclusion of the matter will, I think, be watched with attention by the European powers, as involving questions of common interest touching the reciprocal rights and duties of nations in cases of domestic insurrection where no belligerent status has been conceded to the insurgents.

Some differences of opinion have been expressed in regard to the opposite positions assumed at Madrid and Washington, and it is thought that the adjudication of these points by the American judiciary will go far to determine the international rule for the future.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Vienna, March 25, 1874. (Received April 20.)

SIR: Some eighteen months since I advised you, by my No. 499, of December 9, 1872, of the ministerial crisis in Hungary, which was ended by the retirement of Count Lonyay and the appointment in his stead of Mr. de Szlavy. I alluded to the doubts then expressed in regard to the ability of the latter to meet the difficulties of his position, and during the last year those difficulties were immensely increased. Could the declining health of the venerable Francis Deak, who has been the head and soul of the national party, have been compensated for by presence of the Count Andrassy, whose character and tact had given him a singular influence with the Hungarians, it is thought that the demoralization of the Deak party might probably have been arrested. But with Andrassy in Vienna there seems to have been no one to replace him at

Pesth, and political dissensions, an increasing dissatisfaction with the government, grave charges of a blundering policy, and finally the financial crash creating wide-spread distress, aggravated by the cholera and a bad harvest, followed by confusion and a parliamentary dead-lock, culminated in a crisis unusually prolonged and apparently hopeless. "No government, no party, no idea; where is it to end?" was the despairing cry but a few days since of the "Lloyd of Pesth."

After an effort of some weeks, in which the Emperor, or to speak more correctly, the King of Hungary, and the Count Andrassy assisted, the crisis has been at least temporarily solved by the resignation of Mr. de Szlavy being at last accepted, and a new ministry, spoken of as a coalition ministry, has been appointed under the presidency of Mr. Bitto. Mr. Bitto formerly held the portfolio of justice in the cabinets of Count Andrassy and Count Lonyay.

His associates are, in finance, Mr. Ghyczy, formerly the leader of the moderate left; in commerce, Mr. Bartal, a prominent member of the Deak party; in the interior, Count Szapary; public instruction, Mr. Trefort; justice, Mr. Pauler; national defense, Mr. Szende, with Count Joseph Zichy and Baron Wenckheim; and Mr. Pejacsevich as minister of Croatia.

Much of the antagonism existing among the leading statesmen of Hungary is referable to the compromise of 1867 between the two halves of the empire. One faction, if not a party, at that time, was totally opposed to the arrangement. Prominent men, like Ghyczy and Kolhoman Tisza, not fundamentally opposed to the compromise, desired for Hungary better terms than they obtained, and would, if in power, endeavor to procure an extension of the rights of Hungary in that direction. As the existing compromise, made in 1867, was limited to ten years, these questions touching the interests of both Austria and Hungary are sufficiently near to arouse an interest equal to that attaching exclusively to those of Hungary's internal policy.

There are many who are inclined to believe that parliamentary government in Hungary is a failure; but, plausible as may seem the reasons for such an opinion, there are others that forbid the hasty adoption of a view derogatory to the Hungarian character, and little in accord with American sentiments.

I have, &c.,

JOHN JAY.

Postscriptum.—A telegram from Pesth says that—

Yesterday, 24th March, in the chamber of deputies, the new president of the cabinet, Mr. Bitto, explained the programme of the government, and declared that its principal task would be to remedy financial and economic difficulties by the simplification of the administrative machinery and the establishment of a balance between the receipts and expenditure. He announced that the cabinet will set aside all inopportune questions and avoid all subjects of dissension; and terminated by asking for the support of all parties.

No. 721.]

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Vienna, March 26, 1874. (Received April 18th.)

SIR: The present movements in Austria for revising the relations between the church and state by the series of confessional laws presented to the Reichsrath by Prince Auersperg, the president of the ministry, and Mr. Stremayer, the minister of worship, are the legitimate outgrowth of the independent policy inaugurated by the recent chancellor, Count Beust.

In one of my earlier dispatches, No. 23, of July 27, 1869, transmitting the diplomatic red-book for that year, I alluded to the correspondence of Count Beust with Count Trautmannsdorff, the Austrian ambassador at Rome.

His excellency had said :

That the very existence of the state could only be preserved by the complete regeneration of constitutional liberties, and that to favor the free-living forces of the nation had become in consequence the fundamental principle of the government.

There was also a distinct assurance that it would be idle for Rome to continue to regard Austria as a country predestined to serve its views, and that it must recognize Austria as on the same line with other modern constitutional nations, nor attempt to impose upon her pretensions which it no longer dreamed of imposing on Belgium or France.

It was, I think, on the 30th of July, 1870, three days after the date of that dispatch, that the Emperor gave notice to the Roman court that in consequence of the new dogma of infallibility, destroying the assumed equality between the sovereignty at Vienna and that at Rome, the concordat of 1855 was ipso facto annulled.

The new confessional laws now before the Reichsrath have resulted from that change, their object being to regulate the relations left unsettled, and described as chaotic, between the church and the state.

The government no longer recognizes an equality between the two bodies ; but the government, asserting its sovereignty, has proceeded to define what are the internal affairs of the church to be regulated by the church, and what the external ecclesiastical affairs to be regulated by the state.

The movement is naturally opposed from Rome. The sovereign pontiff, in an encyclical letter of the 7th March, addressed to the Austrian bishops, denounced the new laws as perniciously tending to subject the church to the will and power of the state. His Holiness declared that the laws, although appearing moderate when compared with the Prussian, were really inspired by the same spirit and had the same character. He protested anew against the rupture of the concordat, and declared that the pretended alienation of the church by the dogma of infallibility was a fatal pretext. He invoked the aid of the bishops, and said that he had addressed a letter to the Emperor, praying him not to tolerate in his vast empire the dishonoring subjection of the church, nor to sanction unjust laws. The first of the confessional bills regulating the relations of the church aroused on the general debate a strong opposition, led by Count Hohenwart, formerly president of the Austrian ministry ; and the speeches on the part of this minister showed wisdom and decision.

Herr Stremayer, the minister of public worship, declared that the bill was the product of a calm and unprejudiced consideration of the existing state of affairs, and not an attempt to oppress the Catholic church. He said :

The government cannot permit the abuse of religion for the purpose of intrigues fraught with danger to the state, or allow the servants of God to become the missionaries of an organized opposition to the laws of the country. It is not intended to wage war against the church, but to bring about order in her relations with the government, so that she may freely exercise her holy mission, and not encroach upon the inviolable rights of the state.

Prince Auersperg met the threat of Father Greuter, who made a "solemn declaration" that "we in the Tyrol will never, never acknowledge such laws, come what may," with the remark that it was the sort of thing which the opposition were accustomed to say when projects were advanced that did not please them; but that if it were intended to be more than this, and they really proposed to disregard the laws, the government would be prepared vigorously to enforce obedience. This declaration called forth enthusiastic cheers, and the bill passed by 224 votes against 71—a majority unexpectedly large.

The bishops, responding to the appeal of the Pope, have assembled at Vienna. Among the number are the cardinal archbishops of Prague, Salzburg, and Lemberg, with the bishops of Gratz, Marburg, Brixen, and Gurk. They boldly maintain that the concordat is in full vigor, the Holy Father not having consented to its abolition.

The lower house of the Reichsrath have responded to this declaration by choosing a commission on the electoral laws, of whom 13 are liberals and 8 clericals.

In the house of lords the Bishops Wiery, Faverger, and Gassel defended the concordat in the spirit of the episcopal declaration on the subject, and were responded to by the Count Potocki, Count Falkenstein, Count Trautmannsdorff, and Count Rechberg.

The controversy has undoubtedly excited much feeling, and while the success of the ministry, after the general debate, has led to the remark that Austria has definitively repudiated the principles of the syllabus, it would not be surprising if, in an empire so peculiarly Catholic and with the countenance of some members of the imperial family who are said to continue to exhibit for the ultramontanes an active sympathy akin to that attributed to the late empress mother, the Archduchess Sophia, some pause or even temporary re-action should be obtained by episcopal efforts.

In a pamphlet by the Prince Bishop of Seckau, Doctor Swerger, which is described as "inflammatory," there is a distinct denial of the right of the state to deal with ecclesiastical matters, except by consultation with the Holy See. It is announced that, if the proposed laws should be enacted, Catholics will be absolved from all obligations to obey them; and with a reference to Prussia, it is added that the duty of resistance is the more imperative in Austria, where Catholics cannot plead the excuse of being in minority. "Here we are in the majority."

Whether the ministry have foreseen the full extent of the opposition they have met, and are still to meet, I do not know; but they have exhibited great caution in the preparation of the bills, and are thought to have shown thus far uncommon tact and skill in their presentation.

Herr von Streymayer, whom I remember to have heard charged with Ultramontane tendencies, said to me a few weeks since:

You will not find our confessional laws all that they ought to be, or all that we would like to make them; but you will, I think, see a gradual and steady advance; and that is the only way we can advance in Austria.

The last movement in the matter was one touching the Jesuit seminary at Innsbruck, where the Reichsrath has continued the annual stipend, to the satisfaction of the clerical party and the discontent of the liberal Viennese press. The tone of the last pronunciamiento of the bishops is perhaps more moderate, and it seems to be thought that there will be a diminished opposition on the part of the clericals to the completion of the confessional bills.

The tone of some of the liberal journals is decided, and their language not wanting in frankness. "To-day," says the New Free Press, "there is one, kindred in spirit to St. Thomas and Anselmus, of Canterbury, sitting in the chair of St. Peter. Pius IX will have the strife with the modern state as those men engaged in a contest with the awakened English constitution. And he hates the modern state from the bottom of his soul, because it preserves the blessings of civilization, liberty, and law against the assaults of the Roman priesthood." * * *

I append a translation of two articles on the subject, the one from the National Zeitung, of Berlin, the other from Le Monde, of Paris, opposing the "Journal des Débats." * * *

The Pope and the Austrian church bills.

NATIONAL ZEITUNG, BERLIN, March 21.

We strongly recommend all French and Italian censurers of our church laws not to lose sight of the Pope's letter to the Austrian bishops. In France and Italy people are fond of ascribing the Prussian or German "persecution of the church" to protestant intolerance. In this the Pope, as he has so often done, comes to our aid. It will be known in France as well as in Italy, that there are but few protestants in Austria; but the Pope now says:

"Compared with the new Prussian laws, those which are about to be discussed in Austria do indeed appear to be more moderate, but in truth they are of the same spirit and character, and prepare the same destruction for the Catholic Church in Austria."

While we thank the Holy Father for this testimony, we will gratefully transcribe another sentence of his, in which with his precious ingenuousness he repeats a doctrine which is now beginning to be regarded as really and seriously the doctrine of the Church. The Pope says once again, that humanity at large is destined to be ruled in all things by Romish priests. His words are:

"As the wonderful power of the ecclesiastical kingdom is derived from Christ himself, and is altogether distinct from and independent of the political power, this kingdom of God upon earth has the rule over the whole of human society, and is ruled by its own laws and rights, and by its own superiors who have to give an account, not to the heads of civic society, but to the chief shepherd, Jesus, by whom they have been appointed." This time the Pope repeats this doctrine with regard to the Austrian government, whose view is that it is for the state to define the boundary between the external and internal affairs of the Church, and to prescribe the domain upon which the Church is free. Of course the bills in question could not have been introduced without the assent of the Emperor Francis Joseph. We therefore miss the usual candor of the Pope, when he describes the Emperor and his house as adherents of the doctrines of the Vatican council. It is even too much to say that in early times the house of Hapsburg always actively supported the apostolic see in the struggle for the Catholic faith. But the rights which are now claimed by the Austrian government for the state were at most times asserted by the emperors of the house of Hapsburg, and were only given up in the concordat of 1855.

In his letter to the Austrian bishops the Pope solemnly protests against the abolition of the concordat, which suited him so well, and agreed so well with the fundamental doctrines of the Church, while, as he says, it provided as well for the safety of souls as for the weal of the state, and thus coincided with the principle that, not only religion, but also the affairs of the state, are subject to the Pope. That the concordat was abolished "on the proposal of the representatives of the Empire" is again only half the truth. The imperial government itself was convinced of the necessity of that step as soon as the council was closed; nay, as soon as it was opened. Now, the Pope urges the bishops—and this is the principal object of his letter of the 7th of March—to resist and disobey the new laws. The people, too, are briefly reminded that they ought rather to obey the doctrines of the Church than the powers of the state, when not acting in harmony with these doctrines; but the bishops are expressly exhorted to enter courageously upon a struggle worthy of their virtue, and not to fall short of their Prussian brethren in courage and determination.

This exciting emanation from the Vatican does not enter into a close examination of the contents or of the separate provisions of these bills. It is incredible how far the empty phraseology of this document goes. It says: "The contemplated squandering of the goods of the Church is so great that it is hardly distinguishable from open plundering."

The civic government will bring these goods into its power, and considers itself entitled to divide them, and to diminish them to such an extent by the imposition of taxes that the miserable possession and enjoyment which will be left to the Church must be described not as an honor, but rather as a jest and as a cloak for injustice." What real foundation is there for such words? The Austrian government, which in reality is extremely moderate on this point, proposes nothing further than to impose taxes on superfluous benefices and the superfluous property of convents. All ecclesiastical persons are to retain the income suited to their rank without diminution, and it is only on superfluous property that a tax, beginning at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and rising with the wealth of the owner, is to be imposed. This tax, however, is not intended, like the ordinary property tax, for the coffers of the state, but the money so raised is to be devoted to the improvement of the incomes of the needy lower clergy, and to the payment of those expenses of public worship which have hitherto been defrayed by the state. The Pope does not appear to observe this application of the money for church purposes; to his economic wisdom it seems a squandering and plundering of the goods of the Church, and even a disgrace to the Church, when the government defrays the necessary Church expenses out of the superfluous property of the Church. This is all the gratitude the government gets for dealing so sparingly with the convents and their enormous possessions.

The Austrian government would have adopted very different measures, if it had followed the example set by all other Catholic countries.

Twenty years ago Cavour provided, in a similar way, for the starving lower clergy in Piedmont. He supported them with the superabundance of the convents, the number of which was so great that the whole country seemed to be a convent. He went further than is now done by the Austrian government, which at that time excited the Pope against him, and abolished some hundreds of those convents which were not engaged with education or any other useful occupation, and applied the proceeds partly in maintaining the lower clergy, who were at that time terribly numerous. Of course Plus IX protested against all this, as usual. He also protested against the abolition of the spiritual courts and against the abolition of the right of asylum and of tithes. Victor Emmanuel and all persons who co-operated in the new laws were excommunicated. But this did no injury to little Piedmont, although at that time courage was required to do battle with the Pope, who had great supporters behind him. Further proceedings of the same kind afterward took place in Piedmont; and in Austria, too, more will be done than is written in the bills now before the Reichstag. Cries from the Vatican will not prevent this, but the war which the Austrian bishops, at the command of the Pope, have begun against the state, will hasten it on.

LE MONDE, PARIS, March 24.

The Journal des Débats regards as inopportune the intervention of the Pope in the religious affairs of Austria. In its opinion it would be better for the Pope not to trouble himself with such things. But that a lay assembly should decree laws on the Catholic religion, and should fix the boundaries between the two powers, appears quite proper to our contemporary. A concordat was annulled by only one of the contracting parties. Was any offer made to the sovereign pontiff to regulate religious affairs by another agreement? No; the secular power declares itself omnipotent. The Pope was, therefore, obliged to protest against such a claim, which, after all, is only the same claim as that raised by the Prussian Empire. To support its thesis the Débats must admit that, in principle, religion belongs to the domain of the state, and, especially, that it is for the state to rule the Catholic Church. That journal goes with the persecuting princes and assemblies. In Italy, Switzerland, and Germany men are banished, imprisoned, and robbed for the cause of Catholicism. The Débats will tell us that this is the fault of the Catholics; why do they not show themselves more obedient to the laws of the state? No doubt, if the Catholics obeyed the laws there would be no more persecutors; but neither would there be any more Catholics, as the object of the law is to destroy the Church. * * * The Empire of Austria is undermined. The unfortunate Francis Joseph retains only a shadow of power. A few more reforms and the Austrian Empire will have its 1789. The idea of offending and irritating twenty-five millions of Catholics in a country with a population of only thirty-five millions is such an act of madness that we must go back to the France of 1793 to find its parallel. The battle of Sadowa was nothing in comparison with the efforts made by ministers and assemblies to demolish what remains of the Empire of Austria.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Vienna, April 14, 1874. (Received May 6.)

SIR: On looking over the correspondence of the legation, I find that there have been several cases, only some of which have been hitherto reported to the Department, where the protection of the legation has been claimed by native-born Austrians, who had become naturalized citizens of the United States, and who had been cited to appear for military service, or had reason to believe that they were liable to arrest on that ground.

I feel bound to say that my request to the imperial and royal minister for foreign affairs to direct an examination into the correctness of the statement of facts submitted to them in each case, has been met with prompt attention, that the examining officers appear to have been governed by a desire to interpret the treaty with perfect fairness, and that in two cases of concession made on petition to the Emperor, the parties were not entitled to the concession as a matter of right under the treaty.

SIR: I inclose herewith a copy of a letter of the 27th instant, from Judge Wm. T. Otto, arbitrator on the part of the United States before the American and Spanish Claims Commission, and of its accompanying letter addressed by Baron Lederer to the arbitrators of the two governments, resigning the position of umpire to the said commission.

You are requested to express the regret with which the President learns of the retirement of Baron Lederer from duties for which he has shown such qualification, and the sense of the President of the ability and learning with which the baron has devoted himself to their performance,

You will also request the minister for foreign affairs to be pleased to convey to Baron Lederer the thanks of the President for the valuable services rendered by him in the interest of the two governments represented in the commission.

Baron Lederer to Messrs. Otto and Potestad, arbitrators.

WASHINGTON, April 24, 1874.

GENTLEMEN: By your communication of May 31, 1871, you were pleased to inform me that the international commission, appointed in pursuance of the stipulations between Spain and the United States of February 11, 1871, had just selected me as an umpire for the settlement of all questions concerning which the members of said commission should fail to agree.

I had the honor to accept this appointment, with the consent of the imperial and royal government, as a proof of confidence on the part of the high contracting parties, and at the same time to refuse the compensation provided for by Article VI of the said convention.

For three years I have devoted myself to the conscientious decision of all the cases which have been presented to me.

I now have the honor to inform you, gentlemen, that I have just been notified by my government that I am shortly to be recalled from my post as minister at Washington, and being on the point of delivering my letters of recall, intending to sail for Europe very soon afterward, it will, in future, be out of my power to continue to hold the appointment with which you have been pleased to honor me.

I therefore deem it my duty to resign my position as umpire in the aforesaid international commission, in order that you may be enabled to proceed, in time, to the choice of my successor, according to Article I of the convention in question.

Returning to you my thanks for the kind support which you have been pleased to give me in the performance of my duties, I avail myself, &c.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Vienna, May 8, 1874. (Received May 28.)

SIR: The Austrian Reichsrath was yesterday prorogued, and will probably not again meet before the middle of October next. The session now terminated seems to deserve a memorable place in the parliamentary history of the country, from the important acts passed during its continuance, among which are, since the adoption of the electoral reform, the passage of three of the four confessional bills. With regard to these bills, not only a powerful and determined opposition was successfully overcome, but with unexpected majorities in both houses. These laws have since received the sanction of the Emperor, and thereby any hope or illusion entertained by the ultramontane party as to his possible adverse action has been extinguished and dispelled.

During a reign of twenty-five years' duration, in which heavy and almost crushing trials have been experienced, the Emperor has learned the wishes and the wants of his people, and knows that the measures of the present liberal ministry are imperatively demanded in order to assure the existence of constitutional freedom in his empire, and thereby to advance the general improvement and welfare of his subjects. Accordingly the latest note of the Vatican, the threats of certain ecclesiastical members of the lower house, and the lamentations of the bishops in the upper house, were powerless in influencing his decision.

The new confessional laws invade no personal right; they mingle in no dogmatical dispute, and allow to the Catholic Church full freedom of control over its domestic and actual concerns, while they simply exact from the ecclesiastics obedience and subjection to the laws of the realm.

Herein appears also a laudable distinction in favor of these bills as compared with the latest confessional laws of Prussia, since the former do not invoke or allow civil or police interference upon every slight occasion of complaint, but are founded upon the broad basis of universal and unexceptional toleration, with security of equal rights to all.

In another important measure, which has been under consideration by the Reichsrath, some disappointment has, however, been felt by the community, and more especially with the conduct of the lower house. I refer to the measures for relieving the financial crisis which culminated on the 9th of May last, and which has continued almost unabated during the year since elapsed. It is complained that the plans proposed by the government were well meant, but ineffective, and that even these were received with timidity and hesitation, and not treated with the energy and promptitude which the crisis demanded. It must be, however, satisfactory to acknowledge that in the midst of private detriment and discredit, the public credit has been preserved intact, and by means of a wise economy a near approach has been made to that aim of all sound financial policy, namely, an accordence between the revenues and the expenditures of the government.

It is unquestionably a meritorious result of the constitutional government, that under its rule the financial system of Austria has been consolidated. Various laws have, moreover, been passed favorable in their operation toward increase of the productive labor and resources of the country, and thus materially aiding its financial ability, wherefore a well-assured confidence may be entertained that hereby the losses and detriment sustained so generally in the community through a spirit of excessive speculation will be repaired.

As a further basis to this confidence, may be stated the firm conviction that the period of changes and experiments in the system of government is now forever passed, and that the action and voices of the monarch and of the people have definitely and irrevocably decided in favor of the maintenance of constitutional rights and of national progress as its consequence.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Vienna, May 11, 1874. (Received May 28.)

SIR: Certain declarations of the minister of foreign affairs of Austria-Hungary, in regard to the foreign policy of the empire on the 9th instant before the finance committee of the delegations now in session at Buda-Pest, seem to possess sufficient interest and importance as to recommend my communicating them to you.

In the discussion of the budget of the ministry, upon the interpellation of Dr. Schaup, as to the position assumed in view of the provocative expressions of the Vatican, by reason of the recently confessional laws passed in Austria, Count Andrassy replied, that in the matter of the encyclica but a single note had been sent by the ministry for foreign affairs. He regretted that he could not communicate the full text of it. He especially regretted this because he did not believe that any Red Book could give even an approximate, much less a perfectly illustrative picture of the activity of the ministry for foreign affairs, and he therefore considered it the more necessary that the delegation should possess the fullest right to receive the most ample explanations in all questions affecting the foreign policy, and, indeed, whenever it could in the least manner consistently be done, even to examine the respective documents.

In the present case, however, this could not take place for the special reason that the note formed simply the completion of a private letter which His Majesty had addressed to the Pope. The note was intended to complete the representation of the personal motives which had influenced His Majesty in his decision. A communication of the full text of the note could therefore not take place; but not on account of its contents, which in no respect need to shun daylight, but exclusively on account of its form. The minister sketched thereupon the contents of the note in the following form:

The note has, above all, expressed the view that those persons who had inspired the encyclica were, perhaps, not so much induced by the endeavor to prevent a collision between church and state as rather by the wish to provoke the same. The note had absolutely not brought into question, as was maintained by some, the right of the Pope to communicate his opinion on ecclesiastical matters to the bishops, but it had openly expressed regret that the encyclica, beyond this limit, had declared a condemnatory judgment in matters which were not of a dogmatical nature, but founded in the sovereign legislative right of the state. The government further declares in the note that it, in this, to its regret, so difficult situation, would endeavor to do nothing that could provoke a collision between church and state, but that this would only then be possible, when in contradiction to decisively and absolutely condemnatory judgment of the encyclica, the bishops should be counselled to obey the laws of the state.

In conclusion the note declares that in the event that, contrary to all anticipation, the domestic peace should be so imperilled that the clergy should refuse obedience to the established laws, then the government would consider itself both as well justified as obligated to maintain the right of the state; yet that it further entertained the conviction that it would succeed in fully enforcing the laws.

Upon a further inquiry of the interpellator, whether his excellency was disposed to make communications as to the result of this action on his part, the minister replied that the note was not intended to provoke a response, and that such had not followed; that he possessed no certain basis on which to report the actual results of this action, but that he could not complain, on the contrary, inasmuch as now the matter seemed in a measure to have rested.

A further inquiry of the interpellator, relative to the recent declaration in the English Parliament, and the communications of the Times with respect to the presence of Victor Emmanuel in Berlin, furnished occasion to the minister for certain significant remarks as to the present situation of Europe, in which he discovered nothing that would appear in the least to threaten peace.

To a demand of the delegate, Dr. Gross, that the minister would be pleased to characterize generally the relations of the empire with foreign powers, as also the situation of Europe, Count Andrassy declared that when the inquiry should be so pointed as to ask whether he saw any danger of war probable, then his answer must be absolutely "no;" still for how long a time peace may be considered as certain, on that point he could give no positive assurance, and he, moreover, believed that no man in all Europe now living could say that; yet, this much he might assert, that he knew of no government which to-day intended to disturb the peace; however, there exist undeniably great antagonisms between certain nations; sentiments and interests, which do not permit the consideration of peace as being perfectly assured for a long time to come. As regards this monarchy, he must offer two assertions: one is, that our position toward other powers when it does not alone maintain peace still as well as in its relations to neighboring governments as also toward other states, this monarchy had materially aided in maintaining peace and would continue to give such aid; the other assertion is, that the means of rendering this action, also effectual in the future, must exist always and only in upholding the power of the monarchy to that degree of vigor that it would be strong enough to maintain peace as long as possible, yet, under all circumstances to sustain its own interests.

An observation of the Delegate Serinzi, that he believed that an inference might be drawn from the remarks of the minister, that the repeated personal interviews of the monarchs offered a significant and satisfactory guarantee of peace, caused a reply from the minister to the effect that this had been the exclusive object of the personal exchange of opinions between the monarchs and their ministers, and he therefore considered it the more unnecessary to deny the various newspaper articles which announced on the occasion of the last interview political compacts for a partition of the East, or for a new direction of foreign policy, inasmuch as the same announcements had been issued on the occasion of the meeting of the three emperors at Berlin; and these announcements had since sunk into disregard and discredit; therefore it seemed manifest that when such widely extended plans or such important alliances against any power had not been planned when the three empires were represented, such must become less probable when only two were represented.

These declarations appear to be received by the community with animated satisfaction, and the comments of the almost universal press of Austria-Hungary have been highly favorable.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Vienna, May 25, 1874. (Received June 12.)

SIR: The sessions of the delegations at Buda-Pest closed on the 23d instant.

At its commencement the Hungarian members, in view of the weak and disordered financial condition of that eastern half of the empire, had expressed their determination to insist upon a rigid economy in the grants and upon a great retrenchment in the estimates of the budget, a determination strengthened by a recent calamity, no less than a very general destruction of the vines, with most serious injury to the cereals throughout the country. This was caused by an unseasonable and protracted period of frost following immediately upon several weeks of continued mild weather, which had produced an unusual development.

In consequence a very strong opposition was at first made to the estimates of the minister of war. His demands were, however, for the most part, finally allowed, with the exception of reductions in the extraordinary estimates. To this result contributed in no small degree the remarks of Count Andrassy, which were to this effect: He did not wish to treat the question in a military point of view, inasmuch as the minister of war had already sufficiently developed it. He noticed with satisfaction that no serious objection had been raised against the demands on their merits or their expediency, but solely upon considerations of the necessary exercise of a wise economy. He reiterated his opinion that there existed great probability of the maintenance and preservation of peace, yet no person could say more than that. The government had reduced the budget as low as it was possible for them to do, but if it was deemed necessary to insist upon further reductions, then these should be made in the extraordinary budget, especially in the construction and armament of fortresses rather than in the ordinary budget, inasmuch as the reductions in the extraordinary budget would appear less dangerous at the present time of peace; but, on the contrary, the interior organization of the army should not be weakened. That Austria-Hungary had now no enemies, still she would have more friends when they would have more confidence in the strength of her army. Power and force obtain friends, and alliances with both are sought and cherished. For this reason it would be unwise to interfere with the existing active service of three years, inasmuch as it is the generally adopted opinion in Europe, that without a service of three consecutive years no army is fitted to enter upon a campaign. It would not be advisable to undertake to prove the contrary.

This reasoning of his excellency, as already said, contributed greatly to influence this satisfactory result for the desired grants for war purposes, in the face of the conviction justly entertained by his countrymen that a system of strict economy and a well-regulated and honest administration alone could preserve the country from financial ruin. The last report of the state of the Hungarian treasury, made by the new minister of finance, Ghyczi, exhibiting a deficit of forty-two millions of florins, had opened the eyes of the most incredulous, and through the powerful eloquence of figures had forced that conviction, especially at a season of financial crisis, with a probability of a deficient harvest, the latter being to Hungary, essentially an agricultural country, the gravest calamity which could befall it.

A résumé of this total budget of the expenses of the united government of Austria-Hungary, in pursuance of the decisions adopted by the two delegations, may be desirable. Such total budget for 1875, after deduction of certain receipts, attains the sum of florins 107,418,299, being florins 3,131,078 less than that voted for 1874. To cover this budget are destined the net revenues of the customs, estimated at florins 15,000,000, being florins 2,500,000 less than in 1874, thus leaving a remainder of florins 92,418,299. From this sum is to be deducted two per centum, or florins 1,848,365.98, which falls upon the Hungarian treasury since the incorporation of the military frontier. From this remainder the quota payable by the kingdoms and provinces represented in the Reichsrath amounts to florins 63,399,954. The quota of Hungary amounts to florins 27,170,979.90, to which the increase of the two per centum before mentioned being added will give florins 29,018,345.88.

The president, Gorove, being prevented by illness on the last day of the session, his place was filled by Szorgyenyi, who made a closing speech. He alluded to the sacrifices which the expenses of the united government exacted from the country, but said that the great ends in the ambition of modern nations could only be attained by strong efforts. The security of the empire and of the native country was in debate, and therefore these sacrifices were not shunned, in the hope that posterity might reap the fruits of those sacrifices. The maintenance of universal peace, the desire of giving to the army a perfect organization, which would render it strong and imposing, ready for every eventuality, such had been the guiding and prevailing considerations. As to peace, that seemed certain for the present at least, not only on the base of those assurances exchanged on the occasions of the visits of the sovereigns, but, above all, in the present direction of foreign affairs, so marked by tact and intelligence, so firm and so sure, which, as all must view with satisfaction, is now intrusted to the hands of a statesman whose name is indissolubly united with the constitutional regeneration of the monarchy, and who, in the difficult department of international affairs, has been able to acquire, in so short a time, universal admiration and approbation.

The new organization of the army is nearly terminated, and it will be possible afterward to establish a normal and fixed budget. In voting the expenses the financial situation has been kept in view, and only upon a conviction of urgent necessity a surplus of expenses has been accorded. If the common expenses have not been reduced, that has occurred from a belief that in so doing those duties would be fulfilled which were imposed by the well-understood interests of the monarchy.

Finally, thanks were offered to the functionaries of the delegations and honorable mention was made of the absent president.

To his Excellency the COUNT ANDRÁSSY,
Imperial and Royal Minister for Foreign Affairs:

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, has the honor to advise his excellency the Count Andrassy, minister of the imperial house and for foreign affairs, that he has received a communication from the State Department, at Washington, inclosing copy of a letter dated 24th April last, addressed to Messrs. Wm. T. Otto and Luis de Potestad, arbitrators in the American and Spanish Claims Commission, by his excellency the Austro-Hungarian envoy, Baron de Lederer, announcing his excellency's resignation of the position of umpire to that commission.

The undersigned has been instructed by the honorable Mr. Secretary Fish to express to the imperial and royal government the regret with which the President learns of the retirement of Baron Lederer from duties for which he has shown such qualification, and the sense of the President of the ability and learning with which the baron has devoted himself to their performance.

The undersigned has been further instructed to request his excellency the minister for foreign affairs to be pleased to convey to Baron Lederer the thanks of the President for the valuable services rendered by him in the interest of the two governments represented in the commission.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the Count Andrassy the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

To Mr. DELAPLAINE, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America :

The imperial and royal ministry of foreign affairs with pleasure hastens to advise Baron Lederer, the former envoy of His Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty at Washington, of the highly honorable recognition, by his Excellency the President of the United States of America, of the good services rendered by Baron Lederer as umpire in the American and Spanish Claims Commission.

While it proves a subject of sincere satisfaction to the imperial and royal government to learn that its representative has succeeded in justifying the confidence placed in him through his selection to that charge, the undersigned has the honor to claim the courteous mediation of the chargé d'affaires of the United States for the purpose of communicating to his Government the thanks of the undersigned for the favorable and generous opinion entertained by it which in the note of the chargé d'affaires, of the 16th instant, has been expressed in such complimentary terms.

The undersigned avails himself at the same time of this occasion to renew to the chargé d'affaires the assurance of his highest consideration.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Vienna, July 17, 1874. (Received August 4.)

SIR : On the first day of the present month an assembly known as the International Sanitary Conference commenced its deliberations at Vienna, under the presidency of Baron Gagern, who, upon his retirement a year ago with pension from a position then held by him in the ministry for foreign affairs, was honored with the rank of imperial and royal privy counselor, and a high decoration of merit was conferred upon him.

In this congress, which has been opened under the ægis and favoring protection of the most powerful and civilized nations, distinguished men of science have met as delegates to ascertain the practicability and determine the organization of measures adapted to check the origin, as well as to arrest the spread, of contagious diseases, especially of the cholera, and, if possible, to destroy in its germ this most destructive pestilence of modern time. The question as to the efficacy or necessity as well as to the duration of quarantines, so important to commercial and maritime nations, will receive ample consideration; and there is reason to believe that the decisions of this hygienic areopagus may be adopted as rules of international guidance, and receive enforcement by civilized powers.

It is gratifying and creditable to the spirit of the present century thus to see a congress convoked; not for political views, but for the attainment and accomplishment of plans and scientific discovery which may tend to the relief of humanity, as also to the advantage of commerce.

It is to be presumed as well as hoped that all their delegates will act in concert, imbued with a common feeling and in a common interest, and thus become entitled to the gratitude of their fellow men, while the laws promulgated will stand an enduring monument of honor to them. The emperor has, moreover, received them with special regard and favor; and, previously to his departure from Vienna, they were entertained by him at a state dinner in the imperial summer palace at Schönbrunn.

As no communication from the Department upon the subject of this congress has reached the legation, I was unable to answer satisfactorily a recent verbal inquiry of Baron Schwegel, in the ministry for foreign affairs, as to the cause of the absence of a delegate from the United States; and he expressed surprise, inasmuch as he stated that the invitation had been addressed to the American Government in the early part of May, through the Austro-Hungarian envoy at Washington, Baron Lederer, who had reported its acceptance and his belief that an eminent military physician would be appointed such delegate.

I was invited to a reception given last evening to the members of the conference and to the diplomatic corps, by the Baron and Baroness de Gagern; and he, after a similar inquiry, expressed much regret and disappointment, while he added that he still hoped that the American delegate might appear, who could in such case be assured of a warm welcome, although, as the conference would probably terminate its sittings within two weeks hence, at latest, the value of his co-operation and participation in its labors and deliberations would be greatly diminished.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 21, 1874.

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 767, upon the subject of the international sanitary conference held in Vienna, has been received.

It appears by this dispatch that the conference assembled in Vienna upon the 1st of July last; and you state that, as no communication had been received from this Department, you were unable satisfactorily to answer a verbal inquiry of Baron Schwegel as to the cause of the absence of a delegate from the United States, and who expressed his surprise, saying that an invitation had been addressed to this Government in the early part of May, through Baron Lederer, who had reported its acceptance and his belief that an eminent military physician would be appointed a delegate; and that a similar inquiry had been addressed to you by Baron de Gagern, who also expressed regret at the absence of an American representative. The desire of this Government to manifest every appreciation of the courtesy shown by the Austrian government in extending the invitation referred to, and the remarks made to you and detailed in your dispatch, render an explanation proper.

Baron Lederer, the Austrian envoy, first addressed this Department on the question by a note dated the 16th June, and which was received at this Department on the 24th of June. In it he explained the preliminary steps which had been taken by the Austrian government, inclosed a copy of the programme and of the questions to be discussed at the conference, which he stated would be held at Vienna in the month of January, 1875, and informed this Department that his government had instructed him to invite the Government of the United States to send delegates to such conference, and requested information whether this Government was disposed to accept the invitation.

Fully appreciating the invitation, and desirous of favoring the objects set forth in the programme of the conference, this Department, upon July 3d, forwarded a copy of the dispatch of the Austrian minister to the Secretary of War, requesting an expression of his opinion on the matter, as a delegate would more probably be selected from his Department.

Upon the 18th July the Secretary of War addressed his reply to this Department, stating that the objects of the conference made it desirable that this Government should be represented, and approving the recommendation of the Surgeon-General of the Army that Dr. J. J. Woodward, assistant surgeon, United States Army, be designated to represent the United States.

On the 5th of August this Department received information from the Austrian minister that the conference in question had already terminated, and that the sending of a delegate by the United States was not necessary.*

It will be seen, therefore, that this Government had appreciated both the courtesy of the Austrian government and the importance of the conference, and had acted upon the official information which had been received that the conference would meet in January, 1875; and first learned the contrary after the termination of the conference.

You will explain this matter fully to the Austrian government, that no misapprehension may exist from the failure of this Government to send a representative.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 799, bearing date September 16, in reference to the case of one Josef Barts, who has presented a naturalization-certificate to the Austrian authorities as proof of citizenship, and inclosing a copy of the correspondence with the foreign office on the question, is received, and your action, as therein shown, is approved by the Department.

The right to enjoy such privileges as may attach to a citizen of the United States is properly proved by the production of a passport legally issued.

In every case where the action of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States is invoked, on behalf of a person claiming to be a citizen of the United States, it is incumbent on such officer not only to carefully and zealously guard and protect the rights of all bona-fide citizens, but also to carefully abstain from committing this Government to a demand for protection on behalf of a person presenting a false or fraudulent claim to citizenship.

Naturalized citizens who have become such solely to avoid the duties and burdens attached to a residence in and allegiance to their own country, and who have returned to their native country without intention to reside in the United States, or to assume the duties or burdens common to its citizens, who, in other words, are desirous of enjoying all the benefits and immunities common to citizens of each country, and of avoiding all corresponding duties in each, may be held to have forfeited all right to the protection of the United States. Particular instructions will be found on these questions in section 30 of the personal instructions lately issued.

The attention of the Department has also been called, on several occasions, to applications for passports in foreign countries founded on certificates of naturalization which, upon their face, bear conclusive evidence that they have been illegally or fraudulently obtained. In such cases a passport should be refused and the fraudulent certificate forwarded to this Department.

LEGATION OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY,

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: The imperial and royal government has or some time projected the holding of an international meeting, with a view to ascertaining whether, according to scientific experiments, the quarantine system furnishes sufficient security against the introduction of the cholera, and, if so, what measures might most advantageously be adopted by the governments there represented for the purpose of arresting the progress of this epidemic.

The recent appearance of the cholera in almost all the countries of Europe has caused this question to become one of great practical importance, and the data furnished by the international congress of physicians which met at Vienna in 1873 will be of great value as a basis for the discussion of the measures best adapted to secure the realization of the project in question.

Before proceeding further, however, the imperial and royal government would be glad to be made acquainted with the views of foreign cabinets on this subject, and has therefore instructed me to bring the matter to your notice, Mr. Secretary of State, begging you, at the same time, to be pleased to inform me whether the Government of the United States is disposed to take part in the above-mentioned discussions.

Washington, April 30, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 30th ultimo, informing me that your government has it in contemplation to invite an international meeting, with a view to ascertain whether, according to scientific experiments, the quarantine system furnishes sufficient security against the introduction of cholera, and what measures may be most advantageously adopted to arrest the progress of this epidemic; and asking whether the United States would be disposed to take part in such discussions.

In reply, I beg you, Mr. Minister, to convey to your government the President's acknowledgment of their courtesy in this matter, and to say that this Government will be disposed to take part in such discussions should the proposed international meeting take place, and will in that event probably be represented by a representative from the office of the Surgeon-General of the Army of the United States.

Accept, &c.

LEGATION OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY,
Washington, D. C., June 16, 1874. (Received June 24.)

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: The desire has now been manifested for some time, and in various quarters, again to examine the question where and under what conditions certain epidemics arise and spread, which, like the Asiatic cholera, have not ceased for several years past to deso late the world by their ravages and to impede by their perturbations the development of international relations. Importance has been attached in this connection to the necessity of generally adopting the most suitable remedies, in order to preserve mankind from the attacks of this scourge and of making known new preventive measures which are recommended by experience. The need has been felt at the same time of the adoption by the countries interested of obligatory arrangements, having for their object the introduction of perfect conformity in the measures to be taken in order to guard against this common danger; the need has also been felt of concentrating and thereby strengthening the means of guarding against the inroads of these maladies and of removing not only the confusion which has gradually invaded the domain of the hygienic principles which prevail in regard to these epidemics, and to the barriers which are erected against them, but also their causes, which but too often create disturbances in commercial transactions.

The continual development of commercial relations among the different countries, and the variety of means of communication whereby commerce is carried on, daily prove the advantage, the utility, nay, even the necessity of adopting identical rules for the government of these relations, and of sanctioning the same by international conventions. Long experience shows the advantage of such arrangements. If the free exercise of territorial sovereignty is in a manner restricted by conventions of this kind, it cannot be doubted that the advantage which each country will derive therefrom will be far more than sufficient to counterbalance this inconvenience, which is only apparent. Practice shows, moreover, the great disadvantages which result, for instance, in the domain of public hygiene, from the divergence of the principles according to which it is sought to arrest, in the various countries, the general epidemics which are propagated from one country to another, under the tutelage, so to speak, of these principles. This truth has, since 1866, been recognized by the governments which were represented at the international sanitary conference held at Constantinople, to which were assigned for examination questions similar to those which the imperial and royal government proposes to solve, an object analogous to that which the said government desires to attain. Men of science, of high standing and ability, did not hesitate, during the deliberations of said conference, to proclaim the very views which the imperial and royal government now seeks to promote. The conclusions reached by that conference were highly valuable, and possess perhaps but one defect, that of never having been put into practice. The point then, is to-day, in this order of ideas, to revise, to a certain extent at least, the deliberations held and the decisions reached at Constantinople, to verify and complete them by the ideas and the experience which have been acquired, and, above all, to secure their enforcement, and to this effect, to provide for an international sanitary convention which shall satisfy all the demands of the present situation, and at which all the countries interested shall be represented.

The imperial and royal government has thought that it ought not to be indifferent to these demands, which have quite recently been urgently renewed, as is shown by the resolutions of the third international medical congress, which met at Vienna last year. Induced by these considerations, it has addressed the powers interested for the purpose of inquiring whether they are disposed to send delegates to an international sanitary conference, to be held at Vienna, for the purpose of deliberating and deciding upon certain questions looking to a reform of the international sanitary service. It has the satisfaction of knowing that the initiative taken by it has been everywhere hailed with lively satisfaction, and that its proposals have been favorably received by all the governments which it has addressed.

It has thought it to be its duty, under these circumstances, to facilitate the important task which will devolve upon the conference by causing to be prepared, by a special commission, a programme of these future labors, drawing up now, without restricting the liberty of the views and the necessary independence of its members, an outline of the matters to be discussed, and indicating the end which it is proposed to reach. If cognizance be taken of this programme in advance, it will be possible to cause these matters to be carefully studied and to furnish the delegates with precise and sufficiently extended instructions for their subsequent action at the deliberations and at the conclusion of the international arrangements.

Now that these preparatory labors are terminated, in order no longer to delay the realization of so important a project, it only remains for the imperial and royal government officially to invite all the countries interested in this matter to send their delegates, clothed with the necessary full powers, to the international sanitary conference which is to be held at Vienna in the month of January, 1875, and whose duty it will be to deliberate and decide upon the questions contained in the programme. It will, moreover, be the duty of the delegates sent to this conference to decide upon the bases of an arrangement to be concluded on this subject, and to make arrangements for an international sanitary convention designed to regulate the future relations of the countries interested, as regards the various questions discussed at the conference. The ratification of this convention will be reserved for the governments whose delegates shall have taken part in this conference, and the privilege of subsequently acceding thereto, to such countries as may not have taken part in the negotiations. The imperial and royal government is of the opinion that the governments taking part in the conference should be at liberty to appoint any number of delegates that they may see fit, although it maintains the principle that the delegates of each state shall be entitled to cast but one vote.

The imperial and royal government, guided by the views and intentions which I have just set forth, has instructed me to invite the Government of the United States, officially, to send delegates to the aforesaid international conference, and has also instructed me to transmit, with my letter of invitation, the inclosed list of questions which are to be discussed. It entertains the hope that the Government of the United States will be pleased to recognize the importance of the considerations which have induced it to take this step.

I beg you, Mr. Secretary of State, to be pleased to inform me whether the Government of the United States is disposed to send delegates to the sanitary conference in question, and if so, to communicate to me, as soon as possible, the names of such delegates.

I avail myself, &c.

PROGRAMME OF THE INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE TO BE HELD AT VIENNA

Preliminary questions.

If we refer to the well-known debates of the international sanitary conference held at Constantinople in 1866, it is especially important to examine and answer the following preliminary questions.

1. Is the Asiatic cholera, in the form of an epidemic, spontaneously developed only in the East Indies; and, when it appears in other countries, does it always come from abroad? or has it also an endemic character in other countries than India? If so, which are those countries?
2. Is the Asiatic cholera transmissible by man?
3. Can the cholera be propagated by articles which have been used in an infected place, and especially by such as have belonged to cholera patients?
4. Can it be propagated by articles of food?
5. Can it be introduced by live animals?
6. Or by the transportation of merchandise?
7. Or, finally, by the dead bodies of those who have died of the cholera?
8. Can the cholera be carried to a distance by the atmosphere alone?
9. Does the fresh air, coming from without, and the airing of objects which cause or propagate the cholera, or does the isolation of such objects from the outer air constitute an element having an influence upon the contagious character of the cholera?
10. When there is contagion, what is the duration of the incubation?
11. Are any means of disinfection known by which the generative or contagious principle of the cholera may surely, or with any chance of success, be destroyed, or deprived of any of its intensity? If so, what are these means?

Questions in regard to quarantine measures in time of cholera.

12. Should quarantine establishments be built on land for the purpose of preventing the propagation of cholera?
13. If so,
 - a, where should they be located?
 - b, when and under what conditions should such buildings be erected?
 - c, what would be the conditions to be fulfilled as regards buildings and administrative organization?
 - d, how and by what means is it possible to prevent the introduction of the disease through some channel other than those guarded by quarantine establishments?
14. Should quarantine establishments to prevent the introduction of cholera be also built upon the banks of rivers?
15. If so, (as in § 13.)
16. Should maritime quarantine establishments be built? Should those already built still be used?
17. If such should be the case, (as in § 13.)
18. What are the principles that should be adopted toward persons—
 - a, in order to admit them at once to free intercourse with persons on shore?
 - b, to subject them to a quarantine of observation?
 - c, or to a rigorous quarantine, (lazaretto quarantine establishments?)
19. What should be, for persons in health, (passengers, seamen, &c.,) the duration—
 - a, of the quarantine of observation; and,
 - b, of the rigorous quarantine, properly so called? what is the length of the stay at the lazaretto for persons sick with the cholera?
20. Under what conditions and in what measure should the duration of the voyage of a vessel be included in the time fixed for the quarantine?
21. What are the principles to be observed in regard—
 - a, to articles which serve for the use of persons?
 - b, to live animals?
 - c, to merchandise?
 - d, to articles of food?
 - e, to vessels, cars, vehicles, &c., as regards their admission without having been disinfected or after this has been done?
22. In what consists the disinfection—
 - a, of persons?
 - b, of articles used by them?
 - c, of live animals?
 - d, of merchandise?
 - e, of vessels, cars, vehicles, &c.?
 (Means, method, and duration of application.)

Questions relating to the appointment of an international commission to combat epidemics.

23. Should international sanitary boards, (póstes,) both permanent and temporary, whose duty it should be to study the subject of epidemics, and to endeavor to discover means to prevent their propagation, be established for all kinds of epidemics, or only for particular kinds, and, in the latter case, for which?
24. If the answer be affirmative—
 - a, where shall these sanitary boards be established?

b, how shall they be organized? what persons shall compose them? in what shall the localities consist? what shall be the scientific resources? what salaries shall be paid? how shall the necessary funds be procured?

c, who shall appoint the members of these boards?

d, what authorities shall have jurisdiction over them?

e, according to what principles and by whom shall their instructions be prepared?

25. Should an international sanitary commission, permanent or temporary, whose duty it should be to study the subject of epidemics and to endeavor to discover means to prevent their propagation, be appointed for all kinds of epidemics, or only for particular kinds, and, in the latter case, for which?

Should this commission have, at the same time, to decide certain questions relating to international quarantine in given cases; and, if so, in what cases?

26. If the answer be affirmative—

a, where should this commission sit?

b, what should be its organization? what persons should compose it? what establishments should it have? what should be its scientific resources? what salary should its members receive? how should the necessary funds be procured?

c, who should appoint the members, and who should select the other persons to be attached to the commission?

d, what should be the official position of this commission, and what its sphere of action?

Questions relative to quarantine regulations to be adopted against epidemics, other than the cholera, which may prevail among mankind.

It is reserved for the international sanitary conference to discuss, in addition to quarantine regulations to be adopted against the cholera, such as it may think proper for the prevention of other epidemics which may prevail among mankind.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: In order to prevent any misunderstanding, I have the honor to inform you, Mr. Secretary of State, that the international quarantine conference, to which my communication of June 16 had reference, has just terminated its sessions, and that the sending of a delegate to represent the United States will thus be unnecessary.

No. 26.

Mr. Mathews to Mr. Fish.

No. 110.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Tangier, September 17, 1873. (Received October 13.)

SIR: I beg to announce the death of His Majesty Sidi Mohamed, Sultan of Morocco, which event took place about noon on the 11th instant, at his second capital, the city of Morocco. The deceased Emperor was born in 1803, and succeeded to the throne on the death of his father, Mulay Abderrahman Ben Hisham, in 1859, the dynasty having ruled over the empire of Morocco since the deposition of the Meronites in 1516. The eldest son of the late monarch, Mulay Hassan, whose age is thirty-six years, was at once proclaimed Sultan at the city of Morocco, without opposition, being the will and request of the late Sultan; but there is at the present moment some doubt whether the Fez and Mequinez people, who are supposed to be in favor of Mulay Ismael, (second son of the late Emperor, and at present viceroy of Fez, the first capital of the empire,) and also of Mulay El Abbas, brother of the late Sultan, who commanded the Moorish armies in their war against the Spaniards in 1859-'60, will support the choice made at the second capital. According to Mohammedan law, Mulay El Abbas is the rightful heir to the throne. If they do not, serious disturbance may be expected, as already there are rumors to this effect. Naturally, in a barbarous and uncivilized country like Morocco, such an important event as the death of the Emperor cannot be expected to pass off without some disturbances; villages, markets, and even towns may be pillaged, roads may be rendered unsafe for ordinary travelers, and there is already a temporary check to business, and in the interior they have refused already in some towns to pay gate-duties. On the occasion of the deaths of former Sultans even the seaports have been attacked by the Kabyles, and on the death of the late Sultan's father the seaport of Masagaw was attacked by the Arabs.

A joint appeal has been made to the pacha of this province by the representatives of foreign nations residing in Tangier, to remind him of the responsibility which rests upon him in case the neighboring Kabyles should attempt to attack this town, where about fifteen hundred of the inhabitants are Christians, subjects and citizens of foreign nations.

The pacha has already armed about four hundred Riffiaas and Moors of confidence with as many flint-lock muskets, and has distributed in patrols outside the city walls to prevent a surprise, and arrest any disturbers of the peace; he had adopted terrible measures against robbers. Yesterday an Arab who stole a sheep was chained and tied to a donkey and flogged on his bare back through the streets of Tangier, the culprit at the same time being forced to repeat in a loud voice the nature of the crime for which he was so severely chastised; and this morning a mountaineer was tied with a rope around his neck and dragged through the streets to jail, where the soldiers plunged him more dead than alive. These awful punishments no doubt keep in check the turbulent inclination of these wild tribes.

The British, French, Italian, and Spanish representatives have already written to their respective admirals and governments for men-of-war to make their appearance at the various ports of Morocco, and already a British and a Spanish gunboat arrived here yesterday on their way to the western coast. As for Tangier, I believe that if the mountaineers have the audacity to attack the town, we will be able to give them a warm reception.

Several Christian families have already, for fear, embarked for Gibraltar.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the translation of a letter addressed to me by the Moorish minister of foreign affairs, (inclosure No. 1,) in which he announces to me that the son of the late Emperor, Mulay Hassan, has been proclaimed Sultan of Morocco, and that His Majesty has been pleased to retain him in his cabinet, holding the same position as he held under the late Sultan.

Mohamed Bargash to Mr. Mathews.

Praise be to God!

To our dear friend the intelligent gentleman and protector, the representative of America, Felix A. Mathews, esq.:

We always inquire for your health and pray to God for your welfare.

You are aware that when His late Majesty Sidi Mohamed died, and whom God may have in his glory, his ministers and members of his council met and proclaimed for Emperor His Majesty Mulay Hassan, whom God may assist and exalt on his throne.

His Majesty is now proclaimed and has been well received at Rabat, where His Majesty and his court are now sojourning.

The reason that I did not communicate this to you before has been that I did not see His Majesty until lately.

His Majesty has been graciously pleased to confirm me in the position I have had the honor to hold for his father, and which I now communicate to you for your information and government, and as I know you as a loyal friend, I have no doubt you will rejoice at my continuing in office as hitherto, as we always do rejoice in your friendship and acquaintance, and peace.

The servant of the throne elevated by God, Mohamed Bargash, Rabat, 13, Showal 1290, corresponding to 24th December, 1873.

P. S.—The Sultan is about leaving Rabat for Mequinez, to settle his affairs. May God assist him.

No. 125.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Tangier, February 11, 1874. (Received March 11.)

SIR: Your dispatches Nos. 59 and 60 have been duly received.

Affairs in the interior of Morocco are as yet rather unsettled. In the province of El Garb, which lies between this and Fez, murders and robberies have been committed.

Intelligence has been received from Fez that the Sultan has promised to discontinue the imposition of tolls, or gate-taxes, on animals carrying merchandise, produce, &c. This news has given great satisfaction to the native population, especially at Fez, where a spirit of serious disaffection had been evinced in consequence of these taxes. Foreign traders interested in the trade of Morocco will also be much gratified to learn that this objectionable and injurious tax will be removed. It has been a subject of strong remonstrance on the part of the foreign representatives, and the removal of the tax has been unceasingly urged by them upon the attention of the Moorish government. The Emperor has also been induced to abolish the tax at the advice of His Highness Mulay Abbas, his uncle and father-in-law, who is an enlightened and liberal-minded prince.

At Laraiche it is reported some disturbance had taken place when the news of the Sultan reached that port, in consequence of the contractors, who had bought the monopoly of levying the tax, having declared that they would not relinquish their right of levying it, as they had received a letter from one of the Sultan's ministers directing them to continue to impose it rigorously.

The toll-keepers were stoned by the mob, and the governor was compelled to put them in prison as the sole place of security against the fury of the populace. Serious disturbances had likewise taken place some months ago at Azemor, Sallee, Fez, and Alkasar on account of the continuance of the tax. The government had never attempted to impose this tax at this town, the residence of the foreign representatives.

The Italian corvette "Principessa Clotilde" arrived at this port on her way to the western ports of Morocco. The Italian chargé d'affaires, Signor Scovasso, went on board her as far as Rabat.

No. 139.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Tangier, July 9, 1874. (Received August 31.)

SIR: Referring to the last paragraph of my dispatch No. 134, I beg to inform you that on the 26th ultimo the mountaineers of the Tangier district revolted against the newly appointed pasha, (a brother of the late governor of this district.) They descended in force into the plains in the neighborhood of Tangier, and threatened to destroy the crops of the neighborhood of this place, as well as those of the inhabitants who form the militia of the district, unless they joined the mountaineers on demand. They declared that they would not injure Christians or Jews, but that they would prevent, and actually prevented, provisions and other supplies from entering the town, unless the pasha is dismissed.

The chiefs of the insurrection sent messages to all the chiefs of the villages around Tangier declaring that, if any attempt was made to resist their authority, or to support the governor of Tangier, their villages and standing corn would be burned and their cattle carried off. The tribes then were marching in considerable force upon Tangier and a blockade of this city was expected. All necessary precautions have been taken for the protection of foreign citizens and subjects.

On the 29th the chiefs of the insurrection entered Tangier under a guarantee of safe-conduct given through the foreign representatives; a conference was had and they submitted their grievances to the Moorish minister for foreign affairs, who has engaged to forward them to the Sultan.

On the following morning the usual supplies were brought in from the neighborhood, and the Loko was well stocked with cattle and other country produce. Order at present is restored and Tangier is perfectly quiet; provisions are allowed to pass freely into the town, but the affair is not yet over.

The newly appointed Spanish envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary for Morocco, Don Adolfo Patxot y Achával, arrived at this place on the 3d instant on board the Spanish government steamer Ciudad de Cadiz, and landed at 5 o'clock p. m.

The United States corvette Alaska, Commander Carter, arrived in this harbor on the 17th June, and left this port for Algiers on the 19th.

The British man-of-war steamer "Pigeon" anchored in this port on the 27th ultimo, and on the 30th the Portuguese corvette Bartholomeo Dias also arrived at this port, and last week the Spanish frigate Navas de Tolosa, Italian iron-clad frigate San Martino, and the French steam-sloop Forfait, arrived at this anchorage respectively, and are still in port watching the interests of their respective subjects and citizens.

No. 142.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Tangier, August 24, 1874. (Received September 22.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a meeting of the foreign representatives took place at Tangier on the 21st instant to take into consideration the disturbed state of the province of Tangier. The meeting was held at the residence of the Spanish minister.

Attention was drawn to the state of anarchy which for two months past has existed in this province, the authority of the pasha being practically null outside the walls of the town of Tangier. It was pointed out that the preservation of the public peace for any length of time was most uncertain; that any untoward incident might at any moment occur to disturb it; that crimes and acts of violence had been committed with impunity, and that it was notorious that the pasha had no force at his disposal to put down any insurrectionary movement that may take place. Allusion was also made to the neighboring province of Anjera, which is without governor, and is also far from being in a satisfactory state.

It was unanimously decided that the time had come when some steps should be taken by the foreign representatives to bring the critical state of the country to the notice of the Sultan's government, and with this view it was agreed that an identical note should be presented by each representative to the Moorish minister for foreign affairs. The note was drawn up by Señor Patxot, the Spanish minister, and after undergoing a few slight alterations, was accepted by all the representatives.

I have the honor to inclose herewith a translation of this note, which in concert with the other foreign representatives I have this day addressed to Cid Mohamed Bargash, and I hope it will meet with your approval.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT TANGIER,
August 24, 1874.

The serious nature of the circumstances which are occurring in this country compels me to call your attention, in a friendly manner, to the unsafe state in which this country has remained for some time past. The Christian powers see with astonishment the repeated and scandalous acts of violence by which the public tranquillity is placed in jeopardy, and the impunity with which crimes and frequent acts of violence are allowed to pass without the authorities of the Sultan's government applying an opportune remedy, a state of things which gives grounds for suspecting a culpable apathy, for whose consequences you will be responsible.

Further patience is impossible in view of the insurrection at present existing in this province, and people are grieved to see that the authorities do nothing to terminate this dangerous state of things, which is a constant menace to the public peace.

It is necessary that an end be put immediately to this state of things. I therefore request that you lose no time in bringing this letter to the notice of his sheriffian majesty, in which I protest against the state of anarchy in which this country is left, and I request, in the name of my government, that you apply a prompt remedy to this deplorable state of things, which no nation can any longer see or accept with indifference. It is necessary that without any loss of time you take measures to cause your authorities to be respected and obeyed, aiding them for this purpose with sufficient force and means, or else that you change them for others who have the power to govern. And know that I render you responsible for all harm and prejudice that may accrue to the citizens or the interests of the nation which I have the honor to represent. Thus you will avoid endless complications and preserve the friendship and high esteem of all the Christian powers, who have full confidence in the wisdom of His Majesty the Sultan, that he will find a remedy for this lamentable state of things with promptitude and energy.

Peace and friendship.

 TRIPOLI.

No. 31.

Mr. Vidal to Mr. Hunter.

[Extract.]

No. 46.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Tripoli of Barbary, Nov. 6, 1873. (Rec'd Jan. 27, 1874.)

SIR: In answer to my communication No. 26, in regard to the negro slave traffic carried on between Tripoli and Constantinople, via Malta, I had the honor to receive from the Department dispatch No. 22, by which I was informed that "the specifications mentioned in the paper are scarcely sufficient to warrant a definitive opinion upon the subject. You will consequently furnish the Department with any other facts in regard to it which you may have or may obtain." From the moment that dispatch came to my hands I thought it my duty to endeavor to place the Department in possession of more satisfactory information relative to that trade. I took measures accordingly.

For that purpose I engaged as one of my household servants, Mejbura, a negro woman who can speak, besides her own vernacular, the Arabic language, the Turkish tongue, and the Bernoo idiom. Knowing perfectly well that on board the steamers plying between this place and Malta, it is but with the greatest difficulty that a man can talk to a Mussulman woman, under the most favorable circumstances, I judged it better to send Mejbura to Malta, so that she could, during the voyage, have an opportunity to inform those among the black passengers who were slaves that on the moment of their arrival in Malta they could be free if they so chose.

I decided at the same time that Lueschi, the intelligent and devoted janissary of the consulate, who can speak good or bad Arabic, English, French, Greek, Italian, Maltese, and Turkish, and who had already been in Malta, should accompany that woman to the island, to act as her protector and interpreter.

I sent them off on the 7th of August last by the Ottoman steamer Trabulus Gharb.

My inclosure No. 1, which is a translation of the statements made under oath on the 16th of August by Lueschi and Mejbura, immediately after they were back at this port, will show the Department that they would have succeeded in their undertaking had it not been for the indifference exhibited in that case by the Ottoman consul at Malta, as well as the unwarrantable interference of the brother of the Tunisian consul, who is in no way an official person, and had no business to meddle with the case, and more than all the scandalous and very extraordinary partiality shown by the Malta police in favor of those passengers engaged in the unlawful traffic.

It will be sufficient to call the Department's attention to the following facts mentioned in Lueschi's paper :

There were fifteen or sixteen black women on board the steamer, eight of whom were examined before they landed. However, seven hours later, when the examination was resumed on shore, there were but twelve negroes present, among whom are to be counted the eight women already examined. What had become of the four other ones? They were probably poor creatures who, having decided to claim their liberty in spite of the threats and promises of their mistresses, were prudently withheld from the police's eyes.

The inn where the examination was resumed is the general resort of Mussulman people in Malta, and most of the time one is sure to find there eastern travelers with their servants. Who can know whether the four negroes who were examined there were the same ones who were on board the Trabulus Gharb, or servants of other guests, borrowed to play a part in that criminal farce?

The Department will please notice the strange proceeding of the Malta police-officer. As long as the negroes would declare that they were not slaves, he was satisfied with that answer; but the moment one of them stated that she was a slave and would rather die than go along with her mistress, he stopped the examination and left the unfortunate being for seven long hours among her mistresses, instead of rescuing her at once and taking her ashore. What right had he to prevent that negro from landing the very minute she wanted to leave?

It was my intention to make another trial, with the hope I would have better luck next time. However, I soon found a solace to my disappointment in the knowledge that I had so far succeeded in being the instrument to prevent, at least for a time, the exportation of more slaves. For the Pasha Governor of this regency, and probably some gentlemen in the Constantinople foreign office were led to suspect, when they were informed by the Ottoman consul of what had just occurred in Malta, that Lueschi and Mejbura were sent by me to the island to act as my emissaries. By his long connection with the United States consulate, Lueschi is well known in that island as well as here; and during the examination at the hotel, those among the Osmanli ladies who were most excited against him attempted several times to shame him into silence by calling him a Roomee, (Christian,) an epithet as much insulting to a Mussulman as that of Jew would be when applied to a Christian witness in one of our court-houses.

The Ottoman officials were fairly frightened, lest I would succeed, at a future time, in fastening guilt on them all. Therefore, on the 21st of October last, when instructions from Constantinople had time to be received, Sahmi Pasha, governor-general of this regency, issued an order, herewith inclosed marked No. 2, informing the people and the consuls that measures were taken to punish severely those who would be found engaged in the slave-traffic. I consider that document as a very important one, for it is the official admission from a high Ottoman functionary that the exportation of slaves from Tripoli was heretofore carried on in spite of all treaties and imperial decrees, a fact which I had the honor to denounce to the Department in my dispatch No. 27.

May I be pardoned if I add that, on the other hand, I look also upon those orders as complimentary to me; for do they not show that by my personal exertions alone an odious trade which has been prosecuted for centuries, lately under the very shadow of the British flag, and on British soil, too, has been checked at last?

But the tyrant was killed, at any rate, and the slave-traffic is not in this regency. I know from experience that in these countries all good laws, rules, and ordinances enacted by persons in authority are not intended to be strictly enforced, being promulgated solely because they read well on paper. The very functionaries whose duty it is to see those laws enforced are the very first to break them. There is not, for instance, a high dignitary, let him be general, colonel, cadi, bey, mufti, moodir, mutassariff, who does not, when he sends his family from Tripoli to Constantinople, or any other European or Asiatic province of the empire, improve the opportunity to ship away one or two dozen of negro slave girls.

Wishing to ascertain that the Pasha's orders were respected, for the present at least, I sent Lueschi on the 2d instant once more to Malta, on board the steamer Vilaïet.

But it was too soon after the issuing of the orders, and no slaves were that time on board the Vilaïet. I was informed that two poor Arabs of this place, who were detected at about that time with slaves in their possession, were sent to jail for a year. As the people here say in their imaged speech, "the smallest donkeys are ridden in preference to larger ones."

I must also add a word to what I said in my dispatch No. 27, explaining how those slaves, once in Malta, will invariably answer that they are free. There is in Soudan, south of Kanou, a country named El Zendj, whose inhabitants are anthropophagi. They even file their teeth to make them as sharp as a dog's, in order to be better prepared to eat their prisoners. When the negroes of the other districts are captured by the Fellatahs, to the number of several thousands at a time, those wretched people imagine that they are to be eaten like sheep. Gradually they see their error; but their Moslem masters tell them that while Mussulmans don't feed on human beings, Christians do. Hence their dread of being left in Malta. The most wretched slave, when asked, pro forma, by a Maltese policeman, whose whiskers and manners look ferocious in her estimation, whether she wants to stay in the island, will answer, terror-stricken, "Sidi Stamboul"—the only two Arabic words she knows—that is to say, "Stamboul is my lord, my preference."

Statement by Lueschi.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Tripoli of Barbary, August 16, 1873.

I, the undersigned, Mohammed Lueschi, janissary of this consulate of America, declare, and under my oath affirm, that, on the arrival in Malta of the Ottoman steamer Trabulus Gharb, (which happened on the 8th instant,) on board of which I was, with other passengers, a marine police-officer of that island came on board, who, employing me as interpreter, commenced to examine one by one the black women who were on the steamer, asking them whether they were free or slaves, and willing to follow their masters. The first seven ones thus examined answered that they were not slaves, but were following their masters of their own accord. The eighth time the question was repeated, a black woman, who had with her a son of about two years of age, answered that she was a slave, and that it was her intention to stay in Malta, in order to be taken back to Tripoli, even should she be cut to pieces for making that statement. Upon that declaration the officer suspended his examination, saying that he was very busy. I immediately made to him the remark that there were yet seven or eight more black women to examine; and he answered, "Do not fear anything; I am going away; but not one of them will go ashore." And so saying, he ordered the captain to allow all white people to land, and he himself went away, leaving on board four policemen. I, too, staid on the vessel, and noticed that the slave who had made the protest was left with her mistress.

In the course of about half an hour came the order to allow the black people to land. I went along with the latter, and, when on shore, we were told that, at about 2½ p. m., the police-adjutant would go to the hotel to proceed with the examination. In the mean time the black woman who had declared she was a slave was put by her mistress in her carriage, with her little son, and other black women, among whom there was one who, from the first time she heard the statement made by the aforesaid slave, had not left her alone for a minute, doing her best to persuade her to take back her declaration. We all put up at the same inn, where we arrived at about 8 a. m.

At about 2½ o'clock p. m. the police-adjutant repaired to that inn, followed by four policemen, and having ordered the black women to be presented to him, twelve only came along; among them I noticed the one who had declared to be a slave, albeit the rich dress she had then on was very different from the wretched cotton sheet in which she was shrouded on board. I and the police people could recognize this one, as well as the seven other ones who were examined on board with their faces unveiled, but no one could say for certain whether the five other ones were the same who were on board, for no one had yet seen their faces.

Along with those black women there were also white Arabic women and five Turkish ones, who had come with us to Malta, and in whose service those black women were. At the examination by the police officer there was present Mejbura, a free negro woman, who had come with me to Malta, and who on board had assisted me in examining the negroes, for she can speak their language. Said Mejbura, during the examination by the police, was several times shoved back by the mistresses of the negroes—a fact to which I called the attention of the police-adjutant, who declared he was disposed to put a stop to those acts of brutality, but in reality he never did; and the same inertia was maintained when I suggested to divide the negroes from their mistresses, so that the former should feel more independent in giving their answers, for they were all held by the arm by their mistresses.

I called the police's attention to a black woman, an Algerine named Fatma, who had then adopted the alias of Ejshia; and I informed them that about two months before that woman had passed by Malta, taking along to Constantinople a slave whom she passed off as her own servant, just the same as now she was passing another one for her servant, although she was too poor to be thus traveling with servants. The adjutant said that truly he remembered to have seen that woman at the time mentioned by me.

The Ottoman consul residing in Malta was, during that examination, in the inn, in a room next to the one where we were, with open doors, so that he could see and hear everything, but he never said a word, either to the police or to any of the negroes.

Mr. John Baptist Farrugia, a brother of the Tunisian consul at Malta, who, according to all reports, has important commercial relations with Sidi Ali El Kerkeni, owner of the steamer Trabulus Gharb, was also present at the examination, being all the time among those women. When, by request of the adjutant, I would interrogate a negro, and she would answer that she was not a slave and was willing to follow her mistress, said Mr. Farrugia would say nothing; but every time that, from my own will, I would ask those women to show their certificates, proving they were free and not slaves, then said Farrugia would reprove me, saying that such a thing did not concern me, and that the answer made by the negroes to the adjutant, that they were free and willing to follow their mistresses, was sufficient.

I called also the police's attention to a black sergeant who was accompanying the wife of his colonel, having with him a negro woman and a girl, pretending that one was his wife and the other his daughter, while in reality they were slaves. The sergeant at first maintained his first statement, but at last he confessed that those women were nothing to him.

The police, satisfied with the mere statement made by those negroes, that they were free and willing to follow their mistresses, left the inn, and thus, on the next day, all those people left for Constantinople, on board a large English steamer.

It is evident, in my opinion, that if the police had from the first moment proceeded with their examination, instead of suspending it for six or seven hours, thus leaving the negroes under the influence of promises, caresses, fear, and threats, from the part of their owners, not only that slave would have persisted in her first statement, but there would have been probably others among her companions who would have imitated her example, even among those who had already declared that they were not slaves.

Statement by Mejbura.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Tripoli of Barbary, August 16, 1873.

I, the undersigned Mejbura, a free negro woman, without a husband, born in Mecca, declare and under my oath affirm that two weeks ago Lueschi, janissary of this Consulate of America, invited me to follow him to Malta, in order to see whether there were slaves on board the Trabulus Gharb. I accepted the proposal, and both of us took passage on board said steamer.

During the journey I noticed that there were about fifteen black women, and one by one I let them know that my persuasion was that they were all slaves. They denied it was so; but I made the remark that if they were free, they would have in their possession the certificate of freedom, while I asked them in vain to show me that document.

One of those women, who was a wet-nurse in the family of the Pasha of Fezzan, and had along with her her own son of about two years of age, confessed that she was a slave, and declared that she was unwilling to follow her masters; but wished to stay in Malta, in order to be sent back to Tripoli, should she even be cut to pieces for making such a declaration.

When we arrived in Malta a police-officer came on board, and after the examination of six or seven of the black women, all of whom declared that they were free and willing to follow their masters, came the turn of the aforesaid black nurse, who frankly answered that she was a slave, and wished to stay in Malta to be sent back to Tripoli.

Upon that declaration the police-officer, though there were about seven other women to examine, concluded his inspection and went away. In the course of about half of an hour all the black people were landed, by virtue of an order, and we all went to the same inn. It was then about 8 o'clock p. m. In that inn the nurse's owners commenced to frighten her, telling her that should she stay in Malta the inhabitants would make a Christian of her, and would give her pork to eat; but, on the other hand, if she consented to go to Constantinople, they would not let her be deprived of anything, and from that moment she was free, and no longer a slave. And thus persuading her, they offered her a rich silk dress, which she put on with marks of contentment.

In the mean time the other slaves would comfort themselves by repeating that, if it were written in Heaven that they were to be made free in Malta, they would be freed; but if it were written that they were to be liberated in Constantinople, they would be emancipated there; and also, if it were written that they had to live slaves forever, nobody could help it.

Toward half-past two o'clock p. m. the man of the police came to the inn, and began to examine the black women, and this time they all answered that they were not slaves, but willing to follow their masters. During that time I was more than once pushed back by the owners of the slave, as they supposed that my presence might encourage her to tell the truth.

When the police people had withdrawn, and all was made smooth, the owners of that slave began to jostle me in a very rough manner, saying that I had come to Malta expressly to dissuade the black women from following their masters. On the next day all the people left for Constantinople on board an English steamer, without the nurse having ever received the certificate of freedom promised her by her owners.

Sahmi Pasha to Mr. Vidal.

To the chancery of America, to the illustrious Sir, Consul of America:

When the treaty between the Powers, prohibiting the sale of slaves, was concluded on the last day of Rabié-errel, of the year 1273,* a firman was decreed, issued by the Seder-Azam, by order of the Sultan, by virtue of which those sales were henceforth and forever forbidden, so that those slaves could not be ill-treated any longer, for they are men as we are. But we were informed that several persons are still engaged in that trade in villages, towns, and in this very city, as well as on the sea-coast. In the late stress of famine there were many such sales of black people, and these suffered very much; and there were even merchants who were engaged in those sales.

That trade is forbidden; and those slaves who come to the persons in authority are manumitted, and great attention is paid to prevent those sales. There are steamers and merchant-vessels, on board of which black people are carried away to other lands. Thanks to the justice and good grace of the Sublime Porte, orders were sent to all sea-ports and cities to put an end to those sales, and any person detected in having slaves in his possession shall be punished according to law, (canon,) and the slave shall be taken by force and set at liberty.

An order was given to the governors, as well as to the sheiks-el-beled,† bimbachi of the zaptic,‡ portmasters, and all the officials of the custom-house and the sanitary office to give, according to law, their utmost attention to all merchant-vessels in regard to that exportation.

Any one who shall be negligent, or will not obey those orders, shall be dismissed from office, by the authority of the Mezle-Idaret-el-Ubeia,§ so that those orders be executed, and all sea-captains leaving this port be watched.

To that end was written this document, at Tripoli of Barbary, the 28th of Shaban, 1290 the 8th of Jeshrin-errel, 1289.¶

No. 56.] UNITED STATES CONSULATE AT TRIPOLI, BARBARY, Benghazy, June 30, 1874. (Received August 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform the Department that in about four or five weeks more the exploration I alluded to in my dispatch No. 46 will be at an end.

¶ 21st of October, 1873.

My objects in visiting the eastern section of my consular-district were many, the main ones of which I will very briefly mention, not daring to trust the irresponsible master of an Arab sloop with a dispatch containing important information.

I wanted, in the first place, to study the commercial capabilities of a country with which we have at present no relations, whilst many years ago our exporting trade with Barbary was so important; and, as a consequence, I wanted to ascertain whether it might be necessary to open in Benghazi a consular-agency.

In the second place, it was my desire to see on the spot the workings of the extensive negro slave-traffic, carried from Wadas to Egypt, by way of the oases of Augilah and Siwah, and the port of Benghazi.

I will not here allude again to the scheme I have mentioned in previous dispatches in regard to Cyrenaica.

Moreover, that country is studded with ruins of Greek cities, among which explorers sent by the Society of the British Museum and the French government have already found many beautiful articles of vertu; and I thought our Government might one day desire to search this old soil for similar relics of Greek art to adorn the new State Department, or the Presidential Mansion, the Capitol, and other public buildings.

Lastly, when, sixty-nine years ago, our flag was triumphantly carried from Egypt to Derna, in this district, it is certain that the Department of State did not entertain any idea of permanent conquest; but its purpose was quite misrepresented in English and French books written on that subject; and it must be acknowledged that, were those allegations founded on truth, the sneering remarks indulged in by some of those historians, on the precipitancy with which the United States representatives signed articles of peace by virtue of which victorious America assumed the obligation to pay a ransom to defeated Barbary, would not be quite undeserved. It was in order to gather materials which might be used by the historian who would undertake the patriotic task to vindicate the policy of the United States Government in regard to that war that I thought I would visit this section of my district.

Shortly after my arrival in Benghazi a sort of pestilential disease broke out in a Bedouin village built on the ruins of the ancient city of Barke. The provincial authorities, quite inexperienced and somewhat frightened, were at a loss to know what measures to take to prevent the spreading of the disease. I was fortunate enough to be of some service to them by assisting them with my advice in the mezlis, or divan, and volunteering to go to the seat of the scourge and direct the establishment of a cordon sanitaire. A surgeon of the French army, whom I found in the village giving his care to the diseased with a truly admirable spirit of abnegation, was attacked by the plague the very day I left the place, and died six days later. As for me, my good fortune made me escape unscathed; and when I came back to town the Pasha was so much pleased with my services, that he graciously informed me it was his intention to request his government to transmit to the Department of State the thanks of the Sublime Porte for what I have done in this province. I am already in receipt of addresses of thanks from the captains of the shipping in this port and the Arab authorities in this city, which documents I will duly transmit.

During my absence from Tripoli the United States consular-office is in charge of my friend Baron E. de Testa, consul-general of the Netherlands.

Mr. Heap to Mr. Hunter.

No. 160.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, October 23, 1873. (Received Nov. 18.)

SIR: I received yesterday a communication from the Bey, informing me of the appointment of General Keredine, late minister of the interior, to the post of prime minister and minister of foreign affairs.

General Keredine is a Circassian by birth. He was brought here as a slave when a child, was educated in the Mahometan faith, and has risen from the humblest station to be the virtual ruler of the regency. This elevation is not unprecedented in this country, for all his predecessors, as near as I can remember, rose from an equally humble origin; the late minister, Sidi Mustafa, was a captive saved from the massacre of Scio in 1822. The rise of Sidi Mustafa to power was rapid, for at the age of twenty-five—thirty-eight years ago—he already occupied an important post, from which he was promoted by Achmet Bey, on his accession to the throne in 1838, to that of kasuadar (treasurer) and prime minister, which he continued to occupy, under many trying and difficult circumstances, to the present time. He is a man of great natural talent and finesse, and urbane and conciliatory in manners. * * He has had the advantage of a liberal education, and through his knowledge of the French language has been able to study European literature, and even to publish several works, mostly on theological subjects, both in Arabic and French.

This revolution—for the change almost amounts to one—was brought about by the pressure of French influence. The late minister, while opposing the encroachments of Europeans in the administration of the internal affairs of the regency, had of late favored the introduction of several useful enterprises, such as railroads, gas-works, mining, works of irrigation, banks, &c., and as these schemes, requiring as they do large outlays, find only in England capitalists disposed to take the risk, they appeared to give a preponderance to British influence. The French government, believing that they would find General Keredine less favorably disposed toward the English, employed a pressure on the Bey which has resulted in this change. The Viscount de Vallat, who has the rank of minister but is accredited as chargé d'affaires, was sent here in September last, and the result of his mission was not long in being seen. If the provisions of the French are correct, this change will be unfortunate for the material interests of the country; for without the aid of foreign capital it will be impossible to develop its latent riches.

The late minister retires with a colossal fortune, variously estimated at from thirty to one hundred millions of francs; but there are already rumors that the Bey's government, under the pretext of public and private claims, will sequester it. Much of his fortune, however, is said to be invested in France and elsewhere; a portion of which is probably beyond the reach of the government.

General Keredine was the slave and son-in-law of Sidi Mustafa, and owes his elevation entirely to him. Having risen in the early part of this Bey's reign to the responsible position of president of the council, he incurred the Bey's displeasure by his dictatorial and overbearing manner, and was dismissed from office. But Sidi Mustafa shielded him from the usual consequences of disgrace in despotic countries, and employed him on several important and delicate missions to Turkey and different European courts; but he generally lived in retirement and the enjoyment of great wealth until the Bey's aversion wore away, when he was made minister of the interior, a post second only to that of prime minister in power and influence. He is the owner of vast estates in different parts of the regency, and, although he is lavish in his expenditure, has the reputation, rare indeed in this country, of paying punctually every claim against him. * * * *

The Bey will give me audience on the 27th instant; I shall also have an interview with the prime minister, and shall request permission to visit Sidi Mustafa, with whom I have always entertained the most agreeable and friendly relations.

SIR: I had the honor to inform the Department on the 23d of October last, [No. 160,] of the appointment of General Keredine as prime minister and minister of foreign affairs, in the place of General Sidi Mustafa Khaznadar.

At an interview with the bey on the 27th of October, I expressed the desire to call on General Sidi Mustafa, to which his highness gave his assent. His consent was necessary, as the late minister is kept under strict surveillance in his palace, which he is not allowed to leave.

Sidi Mustafa seemed very tranquil under this great reverse of fortune, though he must know, better than any one, what dangers surrounded him. He was grateful, he said, for the numerous favors he had received from the bey, and protested that his aim had always been the prosperity of the regency and the honor and welfare of his sovereign; he was old and needed repose, and was thankful that he was allowed to seek it in retirement from office.

A few evenings after this visit I returned that of General Keredine, who had called at the American consulate upon his appointment as prime minister. He is familiar with the French language, speaking it fluently and with precision and elegance. * * *

The minister requested me to inform my government that it is his firm intention to devote his best energies to the reform of abuses, the amelioration of the condition of the country, and the maintenance of friendly relations with foreign powers by the respect of treaties and a strict adherence to principles of justice and equity in all his dealings with their subjects, and that he desired above all their friendly co-operation. He spoke eloquently of the abasement and humiliation of Mahometan nations, and although Tunis holds but an humble rank among them, he hoped that when its resources come to be wisely developed and administered, it will contribute no mean quota to the wealth of the world. "We are aware," he said, "of our weakness, surrounded as we are by great and powerful nations, and set the highest value on the sympathy and friendship of your great and generous nation in the efforts we may make for our regeneration." * * *

The next day the minister sent Mr. Conti, a director in the foreign office, to explain that the release of these men was owing to a mistake, and that he would at once order their arrest and re-imprisonment. I requested Mr. Conti to ask the minister to state this in writing, when he informed me that the criminals were secured. Mr. Conti promised that this should be done, but said that it would be some days before the minister could reply to my letter, as, in consequence of a Mohammedan festival, the foreign office would be closed for a week.

EXCELLENCY: It is my duty to bring to your excellency's knowledge that I am informed that the prisoners, four in number, who were sentenced in June last to various degrees of imprisonment for the assassination of Mohammed Sennen, a dragoman of the consular agency of the United States at Bizerta, are at large.

If my information is correct, I would respectfully ask your excellency to let me know the reasons that have caused His Highness to release these criminals.

I was officially informed on the 1st of June, 1873, by Mr. Conti on the part of His Highness, and so communicated to my Government, that the four men accused of the murder had been tried by His Highness in person and found guilty, and that one was sentenced to the galleys for life, with hard labor, in chains, and the other to imprisonment for life. It is, therefore, a matter of very natural surprise to learn that these men, after an incarceration of a few months, have been set at liberty.

The lively solicitude my Government has already exhibited to obtain reparation for the murder of an officer attached to a consular agency of the United States, will, I hope, convince your excellency that they will receive the news of the release of these criminals with the greatest concern.

The prime minister sent me an official communication yesterday to that effect.

It appears that the least guilty one of the four criminals, but who is at the same time the poorest, was not released with the others. He was their servant, and is the one who was sentenced to the bastinado and hard labor in chains in the galleys.

SIR: A few days ago the prime minister stated to me that the Bey had directed him to call the attention of the foreign consuls to the large number of "protections" given by them to his subjects, as he apprehended that if this practice is continued a large portion of the population of the regency will eventually pass under foreign jurisdiction. He seemed to complain principally of the French authorities in Algeria, who give certificates of nationality to Tunisian subjects after a residence of a few days only over the border. I have granted no "protections" to Tunisian subjects, and the minister readily acknowledged that the Bey had no cause for complaint against the American consulate, but that His Highness desired me to bring the matter to the knowledge of my Government, in the hope that it would sustain him in such action as he might find it necessary to take to put an end to this state of things. CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Tunis, June 2, 1874. (Received June 22.)

SIR: A military expedition to the desert, under General Rustem, which started in April last, has given very satisfactory results so far, in quieting disturbances among the Arabs, and reducing many unsubmissive tribes to acknowledge the authority of the Bey, and pay large arrears of taxes. General Rustem, who is the minister of war, is a wise and just administrator, and his integrity is above suspicion. His personal reputation is a guarantee to the Arabs that they may safely trust to any engagements he may take.

There is a project on foot of introducing the waters of the Mediterranean into the great desert of Sahara through a cutting to be made near Gabes, in the southern part of this regency, by which an inland sea will be created of 350 kilometers in length and 70 to 80 in breadth, with a maximum depth of about 45 meters.

This region was once a gulf with a narrow entrance to the Mediterranean, which it is now proposed to re-open. As late as the beginning of the Christian era there were extensive lakes which have now dried up through evaporation, and the streams which once flowed into them from the spurs of the Atlas range on the north, have ceased to run. It is thought that so large a body of water south of the Atlas Mountains, constantly supplied from the Mediterranean, will modify the climate of that region and that its effects will be felt even as far as Sicily. Several careful surveys have already been made which establish beyond the shadow of a doubt that there exists a considerable depression extending east and west for a distance of over 225 miles, and north and south an average of 50, with a depth of from 0 about 12 miles from the sea, to about 27 fathoms near its western limits. The height of the sand-hills that separate this basin from the Gulf of Gabes is inconsiderable, consisting merely of drift from the sea and the desert, and the whole outlay of the work, including the expropriation of several oases, inhabited by Arabs, which would be submerged, is estimated at $4,000,000.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 10th instant, No. 148, and to inclose herewith copy of a bill introduced by the government relative to the transportation of emigrants.

Very respectfully, &c.,

J. R. JONES.

[Inclosure—Translation.]

Bill respecting the transportation of emigrants.

ARTICLE 1. No one shall undertake to engage or transport emigrants without the authorization of the minister of foreign affairs.

ART. 2. Such authorization shall be granted only on the condition that such security be previously furnished as shall serve as a pledge for the fulfillment of the obligations entailed by the contract for transportation, and for the payment, with assignment, of the insurance premium.

ART. 3. Emigration-agents shall cause to be insured, at their own expense, in the interest of the emigrants, the price of the passage and the provisions, all losses and damages which may result from the total or partial execution of the contract for transportation, or else shall place a sum equal to the amount of the insurance in the deposit-fund.

ART. 4. A special government regulation shall regulate:

The conditions of the previous authorization ;
 The cases in which the authorization granted may be withdrawn ;
 The amount of security to be furnished and the manner of furnishing it ;
 The method of inspection and of survey of everything relating to emigration ;
 The management and provisioning of vessels ;
 The amount of space to be reserved for passengers, their reception on board, and their departure ;

The obligations of agencies which have been duly authorized, as likewise those of the captain during the voyage ;

The conditions of the insurance-bond, or the amount of the deposit which may replace it ;

The manner of examining vessels before their departure, which examination shall be substituted, in the case of Belgian vessels, for that which is provided by the commercial code ;

The manner of delivering the certificate showing that the provisions of the laws and regulations have been complied with ;

And, in general, everything relating to the police of emigration.

ART. 5. Any emigrant who may be prevented from sailing by reason of a severe or contagious disease, of which he can furnish proper proof, shall be entitled to have the amount paid for his passage returned.

The passage-money shall likewise be returned to the members of his family in a direct line indefinitely, and in a collateral line to the third degree inclusive, who remain on shore with him.

ART. 6. If the vessel shall not leave the port on the day fixed by the contract, the responsible agency shall be required to pay to each emigrant, for each day's delay, for expenses on shore, an indemnity, the amount of which shall be fixed by the governmental regulation.

If the delay shall exceed ten days, and if, during the interval, the agency shall not have provided for the departure of the emigrant by another vessel, and according to the terms of the contract, the emigrant shall be at liberty to repudiate the contract by a simple declaration before the maritime commissioner, and the passage-money shall be returned to him. This shall not affect the amount which may be allowed to him as damages.

Nevertheless, if the delays shall be caused by vis major, and if this shall be proved before the maritime commissioner, the emigrant shall not be at liberty to repudiate the contract, nor to claim the indemnity for his detention on shore, the return of the passage-money, or the damages, provided that he shall have been boarded and lodged at the expense of the agency.

Any stipulation contrary to the provisions of the foregoing, and of the present article, is hereby declared null and void.

ART. 7. The shipper shall be responsible for the conveyance of the emigrant to the place of destination fixed by the contract.

The conveyance shall be direct, save in the case of stipulations to the contrary.

In case of the vessel's making a stay in any port, either voluntarily or of necessity, the emigrants shall be fed and lodged on board, at the expense of the vessel, during the whole of such stay, or they shall be re-imbursed for their expenses on shore.

In case of shipwreck, or of any other accident at sea, which may prevent the vessel from continuing on its course, the shipper shall be required to provide, at his own expense, for the conveyance of the emigrant to the place of destination mentioned in the contract.

ART. 8. In case emigration-agencies shall not have fulfilled their engagements with emigrants, the minister of foreign affairs, or such officer as shall be designated by him, shall proceed to fix the amount of the indemnities and to cause payment thereof to be made ; but an appeal may be made, in case of dispute, to the courts.

ART. 9. Any infraction of the provisions of articles 1 and 3 of this law shall be punishable by a fine of from 50 to 5,000 francs.

Any infraction of the provisions of the governmental regulation which is to be made in pursuance of this law, shall be punishable by a fine of from 26 to 500 francs.

In case of a second offense, the maximum amount of the fine may be doubled.

In case of extenuating circumstances, the fine may be reduced to less than 26 francs ; but it shall in no case be less than the police fine.

ART. 10. Evidence regarding violations of this law may be taken in Belgium by maritime commissioners, and in default thereof, by any police justice ; in foreign ports on board of Belgian vessels, by consuls, assisted by experts if necessary.

Official reports of proceedings shall be considered as evidence until the contrary shall have been proved.

Ministry of justice.—Extradition law.

Leopold II, King of the Belgians, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting

The chambers have adopted and we sanction the following :

ARTICLE 1. The government may deliver up to the governments of foreign countries, on condition of reciprocity, any foreigner who is under prosecution or accusation, or who has been sentenced by the courts of said countries, as principal or accessory, for one of the acts hereinafter enumerated committed within their territory :

1st. For assassination, poisoning, parricide, infanticide, murder, violation of the person.

2d. For arson.

3d. For counterfeiting of public bills or bank-notes, of public or private bonds; issuing or placing in circulation of such counterfeit bills, notes, or bonds; forgery in documents or in telegraphic dispatches, and use of such counterfeit dispatches, bills, notes, or bonds.

4th. For false coinage, including the counterfeiting and alteration of coins, the issuing and placing in circulation of counterfeit or altered coin, and also frauds in the choice of samples for the verification of the title and weight of coins.

5th. For false testimony, and false declarations of experts or interpreters.

6th. For theft, swindling, peculation, or embezzlement committed by public functionaries.

7th. For fraudulent bankruptcy, and frauds committed in failures.

8th. For association of evil-doers.

9th. For threats to commit such acts of violence against the person or property as subject their perpetrator to the penalty of death, compulsory labor, or reclusion.

10th. For abortion.

11th. For bigamy.

12th. For attempts against individual liberty and the inviolability of the domicile, committed by private persons.

13th. For kidnapping, concealment, withholding, or substitution of an infant.

14th. For exposure or abandonment of an infant.

15th. For kidnapping of minors.

16th. For an attempt against chastity, with violence.

17th. For an attempt against chastity, committed without violence, on the person or by the aid of the person of a child of either sex less than fourteen years of age.

18th. For an offense against good morals by exciting, facilitating, or favoring habitually, in order to gratify the passions of others, lewdness or corruption in minors of either sex.

19th. For blows given or wounds inflicted voluntarily, with premeditation, or having caused an apparently incurable malady, permanent incapacity for personal labor, loss of the full use of an organ, a severe mutilation, or death, although caused unintentionally.

20th. For breach of trust and deception.

21st. For subornation of witnesses, experts, or interpreters.

22d. For false swearing.

23d. For counterfeiting of seals, stamps, punches, and marks, use of counterfeit seals, stamps, punches, and marks, and unlawful use of genuine seals, stamps, punches, and marks.

24th. For bribery of public functionaries.

25th. For destruction of buildings, steam-engines, or telegraphic apparatus, destruction or defacing of tombstones, monuments, objects of art, documents or other papers, destruction or injury of wares, merchandise, or other movable property, and opposition to the execution of public works.

26th. For destruction and devastation of harvests, plants, trees, or grafts.

27th. For destruction of agricultural instruments, destruction or poisoning of cattle or other animals.

28th. For abandonment by a captain, except in the cases provided for by law, of a merchant or fishing vessel.

29th. For running aground, loss, or destruction by the captain or the officers and crew; unlawful appropriation, by the captain of a ship or of a merchant or fishing vessel; throwing overboard or unnecessary destruction of the whole or any part of the cargo, of the stores or appurtenances of the vessel; steering a false course; unnecessary borrowing and pledging as security the vessel itself, or the stores or fixtures thereof, the mortgage or sale of goods or stores, or entry in the accounts of fictitious damages or expenditures; sale of the vessel without special authorization, except in the case of unseaworthiness; discharge of cargo without previous report, except in the case of imminent peril; theft committed on board; adulteration of stores or goods committed on board by the admixture of deleterious substances; attack upon, or forcible and violent resistance to, the captain by more than one-third of the crew; refusal to obey the orders of the captain or officer in command, for the safety of the vessel or cargo, with blows and wounds; plotting against the safety, the liberty or the authority of the captain; seizure of the vessel by the seamen or passengers by fraud or violence toward the captain.

30th. For receiving and concealment of goods obtained by means of any of the crimes or offenses provided for by this law.

The attempt, when punishable according to the penal laws, is included in the foregoing.

ART. 2. Nevertheless, when the crime or the offense giving rise to the demand for extradition shall have been committed outside of the territory of the party making the demand, the government may surrender, on condition of reciprocity, a foreigner who is under prosecution or sentence, in cases in which the Belgian law authorizes prosecution for the same offenses committed outside of the kingdom.

ART. 3. Extradition shall be granted on the production of the original or of an authenticated copy of the sentence or writ of condemnation, or of the order of the council chamber, of the order of the chamber of indictments, or of the writ of criminal procedure, issued by a competent judge, formally decreeing the transfer of the accused to repressive jurisdiction.

It shall likewise be granted on the production of the warrant of arrest, or of any other instrument having the same force, issued by the competent authority in a foreign country, provided such instruments contain a precise statement of the offense for which they were issued, and that they be rendered executory by the council chamber of the court of first instance of the foreigner's place of residence in Belgium, or of the place where he may have been found.

As soon as a foreigner shall have been imprisoned, according to one of the above-mentioned instruments, of the nature of which he shall be duly informed, the government shall receive the opinion of the chamber of indictments of the court of appeals in whose jurisdiction the foreigner shall have been arrested.

The hearing shall be public, unless the foreigner shall request that it may be conducted with closed doors.

The public ministry and the foreigner shall be heard. The latter may enjoy the benefit of counsel.

Within a fortnight after the reception of the documents, they shall be referred, with an opinion for which the grounds shall be stated, to the minister of justice.

ART. 4. Extradition by way of transit across Belgian territory may, nevertheless, be granted without having received the opinion of the chamber of indictments, on the simple production of the original or of an authenticated copy of one of the instruments of procedure mentioned in the foregoing article, when it shall have been requested for a state with which Belgium has a treaty comprising the offense which gives rise to the demand for extradition, and when it shall not be interdicted by article 6 of the law of October 1, 1833, and article 7 of this law.

ART. 5. In an urgent case, a foreigner may be arrested, provisionally, in Belgium for any of the offenses mentioned in article 1, on the exhibition of a warrant of arrest issued by the examining magistrate of his place of residence or of the place where he may be found, and based upon an official notice given to the Belgian authorities by the authorities of the country in which the foreigner shall have been sentenced or prosecuted.

Nevertheless, in such a case, he shall be set at liberty if, within fifteen days from the time of his arrest, when such arrest shall have been made at the request of the government of a country bordering on Belgium, and within three weeks, if at the request of the government of a distant country, no communication is received of the warrant of arrest issued by the competent foreign authorities.

This delay may be extended to three months if the country making the demand for extradition is not in Europe.

After the order of arrest the examining magistrate is authorized to proceed according to the rules prescribed by articles 87 to 90 of the code of criminal examination.

A foreigner may claim provisional liberty in cases in which a Belgian would enjoy such liberty, and on the same conditions. The request shall be submitted to the council chamber.

The council chamber shall likewise decide, after having heard the foreigner, whether it is or is not proper to transmit, either in whole or in part, the papers and other objects seized, to the government making the demand for extradition. It shall order the restoration of the papers and other objects having no direct connection with the offense with which the accused is charged, and, the case arising, shall decide upon the claims of third parties appearing as claimants.

ART. 6. Treaties concluded in virtue of this law shall be published in the Moniteur; they cannot be put into execution until after the expiration of ten days from the date of that journal.

ART. 7. Extradition cannot be granted, if, since the commission of the act with which the prisoner stands charged, or since his prosecution or sentence, such a length of time has elapsed that the term of his liability to punishment has, according to the laws of Belgium, expired by limitation.

ART. 8. Articles 2 and 3 of the law of December 30, 1836, concerning the repression of crimes and offenses committed by Belgians in foreign countries, are applicable to the offenses provided for by article 1 of this law.

ART. 9. They are likewise applicable to infractions in rural matters and in matters of forestry and fishing.

ART. 10. A foreigner who, after having committed, outside of the territory of the kingdom, one of the offenses provided for by article 1 of the law of December 30, 1836, and by articles 1 and 9 of this law, shall acquire or recover the character of a Belgian subject, may, if he be in Belgium, be prosecuted, tried, and punished there according to the laws of the kingdom, within the limits fixed by the said law of December 30, 1836.

ART. 11. Letters rogatory, issued by the competent authorities of a foreign country, and requesting either a domiciliary visit or the seizure of the corpus delicti, or of objects which will establish the guilt of the accused, can only be executed in Belgium for one of the acts enumerated in article 1 of this law.

Except in the case provided for by article 5, such letters shall first be rendered executory by the council chamber of the tribunal of first instance of the place where the search and seizure are to be made.

The council chamber shall likewise decide whether it is proper to transmit, in whole or in part, the papers and other articles seized to the government making the demand.

It shall order the restoration of the papers or other articles having no direct connection with the offense with which the accused stands charged, and shall decide the case arising upon the claim of any third parties who may appear as claimants.

ART. 12. The law of April 5, 1868, that of June 1, 1870, together with all the provisions of the law of October 1, 1833, with the exception of article 6, are hereby repealed.

The words "according to the laws of April 5, 1868, and of June 1, 1870," shall be stricken out of article 1 of the law of July 17, 1871, in relation to foreigners.

We promulgate this law, and order that the seal of the state be affixed to it, and that it be published in the Moniteur.

EXTRADITION.

Report made on behalf of the Central Section, by M. Wouters.*

[Translation.]

GENTLEMEN: Legislation with regard to extradition, after having long constituted an exceptional branch, entered some years since into the domain of common law.

The onward march of civilization, the wonderful inventions of modern times, and the modifications which have almost everywhere been introduced in penal procedure, are the principal causes to which this state of things is to be attributed.

As nations have extended and multiplied their relations, they have realized the necessity of mutually aiding each other in the repression of offenses against the laws of universal morality and justice.

Belgium has not remained behind in this movement.

The law of 1833 was only of a provisional character, and required numerous improvements. These were made in 1868. We will briefly state what they were:

The number of acts rendering their perpetrator liable to extradition, which were only a few offenses of exceptional gravity, has been extended to all offenses in common law which are provided for and made punishable by the penal laws of civilized nations.

To the sentence of condemnation and the order of the chamber of indictments the law of 1868 assimilated the writ of transfer from the council chamber and the instrument of criminal procedure issued by a competent judge, decreeing formally, or causing, with full authority, the transfer of the party accused to a court of repressive jurisdiction.

The above was not the only modification made in the law.

According to the law of 1833, when the transit of a criminal through Belgium was asked for by a government having an extradition treaty with our country, such passage could only be granted by an observance of all the formalities required for extradition itself. The bill passed by the chambers in 1868 required only the production of the document serving as the basis of the extradition, without requiring in anything else notice from the chamber of indictments.

A no less important provision was introduced by article 4, which, in order to secure the prompt and efficient repression of crimes and offenses, permits the provisional arrest of a foreigner, in an urgent case, on the exhibition of a warrant of arrest issued by the examining magistrate of the place of his residence, or of the place where he may be found, based upon official notice given to the Belgian authorities by the authorities of the territory in which the crime or the offense shall have been committed.

The law of 1868, moreover, rendered applicable to the offenses provided for in the first article, articles 2 and 3 of the law of December 30, 1836, concerning the repression of crimes and offenses committed by Belgians in other countries, and the law of July 7, 1865, concerning foreigners.

Finally, it provided for the publicity of hearings before the chamber of indictments, and granted to foreigners the privilege of defense by counsel.

This reform, which we have thought proper to mention here for the purpose of better fixing the sense of the new provisions, was sanctioned by the almost unanimous vote of the chamber and of the senate, and ratified by the general sentiment of the country.

Several more steps still remain to be taken in this path, and they form the object of the bill submitted to your consideration.

It is to be remarked, this bill leaves previous legislation on the same subject intact in all its essential parts. It merely introduces some improvements, the propriety and utility of which have been demonstrated by experience.

EXAMINATION OF THE SECTIONS.

The 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th sections voted for the bill unanimously; in the 6th section it was adopted, three members voting for it and two not voting.

In the third section a member asked if No. 3 of the 1st article of the bill included letters of credit and postage-stamps.

The same member requested the government to explain itself in regard to the generic term deception, inserted in No. 20 of article 1st.

In the 6th section, one member, referring to the 3d article of the bill, pointed out several objections to granting extradition on the production of a warrant of arrest. He thought it preferable to leave existing legislation on this point unchanged.

* The central section, presided over by M. Schollaert, was composed of Messrs. Santkin, Lefebvre, Van Iseghem, Pety de Thozée, Wouters, and Biebuyck.

EXAMINATION IN THE CENTRAL SECTION.

The general discussion was opened and closed without observation.

In article first the section instructed its reporter to ask the minister of justice for the explanations desired by the third section.

A member desiring to know why No. 12 of article first is only applicable to attempts against individual liberty, committed by private persons, and should not be applied to the same acts committed by agents of the public authorities, the section decided that a question in this sense should be addressed to the government.

In transmitting to him the replies to these various questions, the minister of justice requested the reporter to remark to the central section that they do not relate to the modifications which it is designed to introduce by the bill into the present law.

The minister said that the chamber would doubtless think, as did the government, that it was important to alter the text of the existing law as little as possible, so as to avoid a troublesome perturbation in jurisprudence and in the interpretation of international conventions.

The minister added that he had, to this end, caused the changes which seemed desirable in the law passed six years previously in relation to the matter under discussion to be printed in italic letters in the bill.

The central section shared this view.

It is important to observe, while on this subject, that the list of offenses provided for in article 1 of the law of 1868 receives no additions by the bill under discussion. In including the receiving of stolen goods and assaults and wounds which have caused serious mutilation the bill only makes good an omission, the cause of which is pointed out in the statement of motives.

It seemed proper expressly to mention complicity and the attempt to commit crime, which, in the practice of courts of appeal, have always been considered as being understood, by implication, in the terms of the law of 1833 and that of 1868, and have been mentioned since the latter date in all treaties made in accordance with that law.

The new article 2, which provides that, when the crime or offense giving rise to a demand for extradition shall have been committed outside of the territory of the party making the demand, the government may deliver up, on condition of reciprocity, a foreigner who is under prosecution, or who has been sentenced, in cases in which the Belgian law authorizes prosecution for the same offenses committed outside of the kingdom, was met with no objection on the part of the central section. That section thought that this provision supplied an important desideratum in the law, and that ample reasons for its existence were given in the statement of motives.

A Belgian might happen to be condemned in contumaciam in Belgium for a crime provided for by article 5 of the code of criminal examination, and then might cause scandal by coming to make a parade of his impunity on our frontiers, without fear of being disturbed or delivered up on account of an act committed outside of our territory.

Everybody admits that the law cannot tolerate such a thing.

Nevertheless, in order to prevent certain countries from unduly extending their jurisdiction in foreign countries, and thus removing persons whose extradition is desired by them from the jurisdiction of their natural judges, the bill wisely provides that the government shall not surrender, on condition of reciprocity, a foreigner who is under prosecution or who has been sentenced, save in cases in which the Belgian law authorizes prosecution for the same offenses committed outside of the kingdom. By reason of this restriction, which is formally stated in the law, the measure introduced can present no inconvenience.

With regard to article 3, a member made the same observations that were made in the 6th section.

A warrant of arrest seemed to him to be too summary a document to authorize extradition. He feared that this mode of proceeding might bring about abuses. It was better, he thought, to continue to require a previous examination in a foreign country.

This opinion was not shared by the section.

The measure whose adoption was proposed by the bill seemed to it to be supported by the strongest grounds.

Let us observe in the first place, that it has been adopted in the treaties of all countries successively, save those which have been concluded by Belgium and the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, and this constant and almost universal practice has given rise to no inconvenience. It is readily seen that the exceptional position in which we are placed in this respect must be damaging to our relations with foreign governments, since it does not permit us to offer a reciprocity founded upon broader bases, such as is generally admitted in the conclusion of international arrangements in relation to extradition.

Considered in itself, the proposed measure offers very great advantages, which we will succinctly examine.

Its first effect will be to exert a decisive influence upon the speediness of the proceedings.

It must be admitted that a preparatory examination in the absence of the party accused, so that he cannot be confronted with his accomplices or with the witnesses, is necessarily incomplete and defective.

Moreover, in the case of an arrest in a foreign country, it being necessary that the decision for the transfer to a competent judge be produced within two months, the examining magistrate must confine himself to an investigation which is too often imperfect and inconclusive as to the facts of the case.

The case runs the risk, therefore, of being delivered over to the hazards of a hearing, without having been either matured or elucidated.

The inconvenience is especially apparent in criminal matters, in which the intervention of the council-chamber is not sufficient, and in which the court must, in its turn, pronounce sentence within the allotted time.

The interest of the accused is here identical with that of the prosecution.

Is it not evident that an examination held in his absence, when he can produce no evidence in his own behalf, must result in an order for the transfer of the accused to a competent court, and that it can have no other effect than to prolong his detention without any benefit to him?

Besides, it frequently happens that the accused asks to be delivered up to justice in his own country without delay, without waiting to go through the formalities of extradition, although he is then obliged to renounce the immunities which are secured to him by law and treaty.

Henceforth this will not be the case; he will be present himself throughout the examination, will choose a defender to aid him in refuting the charges made against him, and that without being deprived of any of the guarantees provided by article 6 of the law of December 1, 1833, which was kept in force by the law of 1868.

Let us not lose sight of the fact that our organic extradition law was enacted that we might conclude treaties with all civilized nations, and not only with countries whose forms of procedure are the same as our own.

In order to obviate the difficulties which might have arisen from the difference in the manner of organization of the repressive tribunals of foreign countries and those of Belgium, the law of 1868 assimilated to the writ of transfer from the council-chamber and to the order of the chamber of indictments the corresponding writ of a foreign criminal court.

It was evidently impossible precisely to define these documents; a rule, which permitted no deviation from it, was that they were to be the last instrument of preparatory procedure transferring the accused to the jurisdiction of his final judges.

But how is it to be determined whether the foreign document possesses this character, and whether no intermediate instrument is to come between the warrant of arrest and the appearance of the accused before the judge who is to punish or acquit him?

What shall we say especially of the English and American warrants? Can we recognize them as really possessing the character which the law requires? What shall we decide as regards the order for Eröffnung der Untersuchung, which is a part of the German procedure, the auto de prison of the Spanish laws, &c.? These documents daily give rise to difficulties to which the measure proposed by the bill would put an end, and which are now the only obstacle to the conclusion of an extradition treaty with the United States, which country has been the place of refuge for the majority of the great criminals who for some years past have escaped from justice in Belgium. The United States have inscribed in their laws the principle of the presence of the accused at every stage of his examination.

The extradition on a warrant of arrest is, moreover, readily reconcilable with the new provisions of the bill for precautionary detention, which has been viewed with such marked favor by public opinion.

It may even be said that it is the corollary and the necessary condition of the passage of this bill.

For if the legislator steps aside in this matter from the rigor of our penal procedure, if he leaves the accused party, who is presumed to be guilty, provisionally at liberty, this is done with the moral certainty that he will appear to answer the charge made against him. If he abuses the confidence of the examining magistrate by crossing the frontier, he must be restored, as speedily as possible, to his natural judges, without necessity of having recourse to all the formalities of a preparatory examination, the least inconvenience of which is that it is sometimes accompanied with delays which are incompatible with a proper administration of justice.

It is to be remarked that the new guarantees contained in the bill which was introduced on the 20th of January last are to be applicable to a Belgian surrendered by extradition for trial by the courts of his country.

Thus, immediately after his examination, he may communicate with his counsel. (Art. 3.) Thus also, within five days after the examination, the maintenance of the warrant of arrest will be made subject to confirmation by the council-chamber. (Art. 4.)

The case is the same with the guarantees provided in the following articles, the benefits of which cannot be denied him.

And let it not be said that a warrant of arrest is too summary a document, and that it does not permit the chamber of indictments to base its judgment upon sufficient information. This objection would seem more valid if Belgian judges had to decide concerning the guilt of accused parties whose extradition was demanded by foreign governments. This is no part of their duty; all that they have to do is to examine whether the offense with which the accused is charged in the document produced, be it a warrant of arrest, writ of transfer, indictment, or sentence, is provided for and made punishable by our laws, and whether it is among the offenses enumerated in the extradition treaty.

A warrant of arrest not containing these indications would be irregular, and could not be accepted.

Let us observe, finally, that the introduction of this measure in nowise impairs the guarantees provided by the laws of 1833 and 1868.

Thus the warrant of arrest will first be rendered executory by the council-chamber; the session of the chamber of indictments, when the latter is called upon to give its opinion, is to be public, and a foreigner may enjoy the benefit of counsel.

All these guarantees must evidently remove all fear of an arbitrary or exaggerated enforcement of the law.

The provision of article 4 of the bill was adopted by the section without debate.

The framer of the law of 1833 thought little about the transit question, and this is not at all strange; extradition was then considered as a measure of exceptional gravity, principally confined to countries bordering upon each other. Since that time the principle has become general as the relations of nations have become extended, and the number of treaties has been greatly increased.

Of the nineteen conventions which Belgium has with other countries, only four are with countries bordering upon her; in the case of most of the others transit has become a necessity.

It was therefore a necessity that the formalities prescribed by our laws in this matter should be simplified in certain respects.

Transit cannot be considered as a real extradition, nor can a foreigner who thus passes through our country by compulsion be compared to one who comes of his own accord to seek an asylum there under the ægis of its laws.

To prevent his passage through our territory would be opposing a simple measure of execution, without any benefit to the foreigner; it would cause long and costly delays, and would subject our country to inevitable reprisals.

Belgium was therefore deeply interested in the adoption of a mode of procedure which should be free from these difficulties and delays. The law of 1868 provided for such a mode in its third article, and the new bill only supplements that provision.

The proposition to increase from ten to fifteen days the duration of the provisional arrest in the case of a country bordering upon our own, and the authorization to extend this time to three months in the case of countries not in Europe, did not form a subject of discussion in the section; the reasons for this change are given in the statement of motives, and justify it in all points.

A final improvement is introduced in article 12 (new) of the bill. It authorizes compliance with letters rogatory issued by competent authorities in foreign countries, and asking either for a domiciliary visit or the seizure of the corpus delicti or documents which can convict the accused, in the case of one of the acts enumerated in the first article of this law.

The need of this improvement had long been felt; the legitimate complaints made in consequence of damage done to commercial and industrial interests rendered it very necessary.

Various requests from our judicial authorities, asking that domiciliary visits and seizures might be made in other countries, have necessarily remained unexecuted on account of the inability of our Government to grant reciprocity when similar requests were addressed to it by those countries.

Our constitution declares that a man's domicile is inviolable, and permits a deviation from this principle only in the cases provided for by the law, and in the form which the law establishes.

No. 4 of article 5 of the law of 1868 authorizes, it is true, the examining magistrate to proceed in accordance with the rules prescribed by articles 87 to 90 of the code of criminal examination, but this article is not applicable in the matter in question, in which it is necessary to proceed to the visit and seizure, independently of any demand for extradition.

It was therefore proper to extend the exception somewhat.

Belgium is interested therein in the same way as foreign powers, for it frequently happens that an accused person takes advantage of the time which precedes his arrest and sends his papers and correspondence across the frontier, such papers being all that can establish the evidence of his guilt and render the examination satisfactory.

In reality, the seizure of embezzled articles or of documents which can convict, is, as remarked in the statement of motives, but a kind of material extradition, which is based upon the same principles as the surrender of the accused.

But, in the same manner as extradition, the execution of letters rogatory requesting domiciliary visits and seizures must be surrounded by strong guarantees, designed to protect the domiciles of Belgian citizens from indiscreet and unwarranted search.

The first of these guarantees should be to restrict the execution of letters rogatory in such matters to those cases in which the law allows extradition to be granted.

There will then be no danger of search in political matters or in matters in which the press is concerned; nor will there be any in fiscal matters and others not specially provided for.

A second guarantee inserted in the bill is the following: Letters rogatory from a foreign country must be rendered executory by the council chamber of the tribunal of first instance of the place where the search and seizure are to be made.

A doubt arose in the central section in regard to the proper interpretation of No. 5 of article 12.

The following is the reply of the minister of justice to the inquiry addressed to him on this subject:

"The provision of the concluding portion of article 12 (bill) can by no means result in investing the council chamber with the right to decide civil suits in cases in which the ownership of articles is claimed by a third party. The functions of the council chamber are in such cases purely conservative. It being its duty only to order the surrender of the articles seized to the foreign government, it has no other right except to refuse such surrender when third parties holding the articles, or others, such as unpaid hotel-keepers or tradesmen, are interested in having the seized articles prevented from crossing the frontier.

"The action of civil justice naturally remains reserved in this case, as in the one provided for in the 6th paragraph of article 5 of the law of 1868. The mention of the third parties appearing as claimants was only inserted in the bill for the purpose of formally enabling them to oppose, before the council chamber, the sending of the articles to a foreign country."

This letter having been read to the section, a member proposed to extend to the 6th paragraph of article 5 of the bill the provision of the concluding portion of the 12th article. This addition to the text of article 5, being recommended by the same considerations as those just stated, was approved.

The bill was passed by the central section, all the members present voting in its favor.

APPENDIX.

Questions asked by the central section.—1st. Does No. 3 of article 1 of the bill include letters of credit and postage-stamps?

Replies of the minister of justice.—"1st. Article 1, No. 3, of the bill, reproducing the text of the corresponding provision of the law of April 5, 1868, is applicable, as is that provision, to forgeries committed in letters of credit, which is evidently comprised in the terms of articles 196 and 197 of the penal code, which are referred to by No. 3, and which provide for the punishment of the crime of forgery and the use of forgeries which have been committed in commercial papers or blank checks or in private letters. (See Parliamentary documents, 1867-'68, Appendix to No. 76.)

As to the counterfeiting of postage-stamps, it is comprised not only in No. 3, but also in No. 23 of article 1. The text thereof is identical with that of the law of April 5, 1868, which refers to articles 188 and 189 of the penal code, which provide for the punishment of the crime of counterfeiting postage-stamps and other adhesive stamps, and the use of such counterfeit stamps."

2d. Why does No. 12 of article 1 only apply to attempts against individual liberty committed by private persons, without referring to the same acts committed by the agents of public authority?

"No. 12 of article 1 confines itself in the new law, as in the law of 1868, to attempts against individual liberty committed by private persons, and provided for by articles 434-442 of the penal code, because the same acts committed by agents of the public authority are included among crimes and offenses against the rights guaranteed by the constitution, (Title II, arts. 147 and 148 of the penal code,) and because crimes of this kind might, under certain circumstances, be of a political character."

3d. What is the precise meaning of the word deception in No. 20 of the bill?

"3d. The precise meaning of the word deception in No. 20 of the bill is determined by the reference made by the law of 1868, same number, to articles 498-501 of the penal code. This word, therefore, includes deception practiced in regard to the identity, nature, origin, and quantity of things sold, as well as the adulteration of articles of food."

Amendment made by the central section:

Art. 5, at the end. "And shall decide the case arising upon the claims of third parties appearing as claimants."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 17, 1874.

SIR: I transmit herewith, authenticated under the seal of this Department, a copy of the joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, approved on this date, in regard to the termination of the treaty concluded between the United States and the King of the Belgians on the 17th of July, 1858. The President directs me, in compliance with the seventeenth article of that instrument, and with the requirement of the aforesaid resolution, to instruct you to communicate to His Majesty's government a certified copy of the inclosed papers, and formally to notify His Majesty's government, immediately on the receipt of this, that as it is considered to be no longer for the interest of the United States to continue the said treaty in force, it will terminate and be of no further effect at the expiration of twelve months from the date upon which the notice shall be given.

I am, &c.,

JOINT RESOLUTION providing for the termination of the treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, concluded at Washington, July seventeenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight.

Whereas it is provided by the seventeenth article of the treaty between the United States of America on the one part, and His Majesty the King of the Belgians on the other part, concluded at Washington on the seventeenth day of July, anno Domini eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, that "the present treaty shall be in force during ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, and until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall have announced to the other its intention to terminate the operation thereof, each party reserving to itself the right of making such declaration to the other at the end of the ten years above mentioned, and it is agreed that, after the expiration of the twelve months' prolongation accorded on both sides, this treaty and all its stipulations shall cease to be in force;" and

Whereas it is no longer for the interest of the United States to continue the said treaty in force: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notice be given of the termination of said treaty according to the provisions of the said seventeenth article thereof for such termination, and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to communicate such notice to the government of the kingdom of Belgium.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Brussels, July 1, 1874. (Received July 15.)

SIR: In accordance with the instructions contained in your dispatch No. 176, of the 17th of June last, I to-day addressed a note to Count d'Aspremont Lynden giving formal notice of the termination of the treaty concluded between the United States and the King of the Belgians on the 17th of July, 1858, and inclosing at the same time a certified copy of the resolution expressing the sense of Congress on that subject, copies of which I inclose herewith.

This note was delivered by me, at noon to-day, to Count Borchgrave, Chef de Cabinet, Count d'Aspremont being absent from the city.

I took occasion to assure Count de Borchgrave that the notice was only given because it had become necessary for my Government to abrogate the fourth and thirteenth articles of the treaty; that these articles in their practical operation, and under the favored-nation clause in the treaties with the Hanseatic republics, work a discrimination against our commercial marine, and in favor of foreign vessels, and are giving considerable trouble; that the United States have no desire to disturb the rest of the treaty, and that should the Belgian government prefer to agree to the abrogation of these articles, leaving the rest of the treaty to stand, I should be authorized to sign a new treaty embracing the other remaining articles.

Brussels, July 7, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the letter which you were pleased to address to me, under date of the 1st instant, to give me notice of the resolution which the Government of the United States has thought fit to take to annul the treaty of commerce and navigation of July 17, 1858.

You are of opinion, sir, that the term of twelve months which is to follow the notification will begin from the day of the reception by my department of the communication of July 1.

The letter referred to reached me on the same day upon which it was sent.

The government of the King concurs with you, sir, that the treaty above mentioned will cease to have effect on July 1, 1875.

[Extract.]

No. 97.]

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

(Petropolis,) Rio de Janeiro, February 20, 1873. (Rec'd March 21.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your No. 65 with inclosures, in relation to the estate of William T. Harris, who died at Bahia, January, 1852.

* * * * *

In connection with this case I beg to call the attention of the Department to the condition of estates (of American citizens dying here) under Brazilian administration, in pursuance of their claim of exclusive jurisdiction, and notwithstanding the intervention of United States consuls, claiming under the eleventh article of the treaty of 1828.

That treaty made no express provision for administration by consuls. By the eleventh article, which the legation here (Mr. Wise, Mr. Tod, and Mr. Schenck) has contended was not abrogated by the notice (1841) to terminate other parts, (since that article does not relate to commerce or navigation,) the citizens of each party were allowed the right of succession, whether by testament or ab intestato, and might take possession by themselves or others acting for them and dispose of the same, paying only such dues as the inhabitants of the country where the estate was should be subject to pay in like cases.

Under this article, Mr. Schenck, however, claimed the exclusive right of the consul as the proper representative to take possession and administer, and notified the foreign office here (10th January, 1852) that "the United States Government regarded the eleventh article as still in force, not being one of the parts relating to commerce and navigation, and that under it they would insist that the proper representative of any United States citizen dying in Brazil shall succeed, by testament or ab intestato, and shall take possession by themselves or agents, including as such their proper consuls, who, by regulations of the United States, are authorized to act for them, subject only to the conditions and limitations of said article."

The consular convention, referred to in Article XXXII, was never negotiated, and the attempt to renew the treaty, with express power to consuls in such cases, by Mr. Tod, under Mr. Buchanan's direction, failed.

Notwithstanding this, the juizes de defuntos have allowed and invited foreign consuls to be present at and take part in the collection of assets and nomination of a curator of such estates; and they have sometimes done this in case, also, of United States citizens, although the ordinance under which the judges acted provided for so doing only in cases of citizens of those countries in which the same right was extended to Brazilian consuls to take possession and administer.

Such invitation was extended (under law of 1845, still in force and noticed further on) in this case of Harris to the United States consul at Bahia, Mr. John S. Gillmer, on the 24th January, 1852, as may be seen by the document relating to this case. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 70, 40th Cong., 3d sess., p. 3.) To this invitation Mr. Gillmer (who had already put his seals on the rooms containing the property) answered, that "he did not recognize the jurisdiction of the Brazilian authorities in the premises," and made complaint to the president of the province, and in April to Mr. Schenck here, who informed him (February 24, 1852) that, under the eleventh article of the treaty he claimed exclusive right, &c., as above stated; and this, notwithstanding the Brazilian decree (No. 855) of the 8th November, 1851, regulating the rights and privileges of foreign consular agents. A copy of this decree is annexed to Mr. Schenck's No. 14, (November 29, 1851.) Its title is, "Decree regulating the privileges and attributes of foreign consular agents in the empire, and the mode of proceeding to be observed in the collection and administration of the estates of the citizens of their nations, when Brazilian consuls are allowed reciprocity in their countries."

The Brazilian government, then, now claims, since there is no consular convention with the United States (as with those nations mentioned in my No. 65, all of which expire August 20, 1873) granting their consuls the right of administration, and since Brazilian consuls in the United States are not allowed to take possession of and administer the estate of Brazilian subjects dying there, which are administered by the State tribunals exclusively, that the estates of American citizens dying here are, in like manner, subject to administration of the regular Brazilian tribunals, (Juizo de Orphãos e Ausentes), and their statement of the discussions with the United States Government here may be found in Pereira Pinto's treatise on the "Treaties of Brazil," &c., (sent to the Department with my No. 12,) and a translation of which is hereto annexed.

If administration of estates in Brazil in these cases (foreigners dying here) were guarded and secured in fact and practice as well as by legal provisions, and if distribution could be secured within a reasonable time, there would be no just cause of complaint. But it is notorious that in these cases (even where the widow and the children of such foreigners are here and ought to control the administration) the assets are consumed in the courts by expenses or withheld without distribution under pretext of want of proof of heirship; and often no account of them can be had. Their condition is set forth, in language that is hardly extravagant, in Mr. Wise's No. 50. And since that time, on almost every occasion when an American citizen has died "intestate here, leaving assets in Brazil, the same complaint—of refusal to admit the intervention of the consul, appointment of some stranger to the inheritance, but friend of the court, of delay or withholding of account, and of final evaporation of the property—has been made to this legation. The latest case is of the jewels, &c., belonging to the late Mr. Gottschalk, and the estate of Mr. Block.

My predecessors have asked instructions from the Department as to its interpretation of the eleventh article; and, if it is still in force, as to the right under it of our consuls, as representatives, (others for them,) to collect, have possession, and administer. If the eleventh article is no longer in force, still, I think, our consuls may intervene, under the present Brazilian law, (1845,) not to take possession and administer, but to be present and take part in the collection of assets, and may compel an account. At least such is the legal provision here, independent of any treaty or consular convention. The difficulty arises in the attempt to secure a proper execution of this law. Consuls admit that they are notified of the death, invited to be present and take part; but declare that this is only a nominal compliance; that any objection of theirs is unheeded, and the judge names some familiar of his own to be curator and administrator of the assets, which are in many cases never heard of afterwards. As the matter now stands, from uncertainty as to the views of the Department as to the perpetuity and construction of Article XI; from the fact of exclusive jurisdiction asserted and exercised by Brazil; from what, notwithstanding very fair provisions of their law, is really done by their tribunals, delay, waste, and loss are inevitable to the estate of every American citizen dying intestate here.

Fortunately these are not numerous, and our cases are comparatively rare; but there are many French, Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese subjects here, and of the last, especially, an immense number come, remain, and die here. At present, and until 20th August next, the effects of such, under their consular conventions, are taken into possession and distributed by their consuls, exclusive of the Brazilian tribunals; and, if there be no renewal of these privileges, there must arise a condition of things, if these estates shall revert to Brazilian administration (by reason of their number and value) to which, I think, those nations will not be inclined to submit if they can prevent it.

The law of Brazil to which I refer is of 27th June, 1845, previous to the decree of 1851, above mentioned, and not, like it, referring to consular administration only in cases of reciprocity. This law is still in force and provides—

ARTICLE 11. In the right allowed to consuls of foreign nations to be present at judicial and administrative acts relating to estates of decedents and absent persons of their nations, there will be understood to be included the right of requiring, in presence of the authorities of the country, that all legal measures be taken which may conduce to the full collection and administration of said estates; and further, also, the right to be heard in respect to the choice and nomination of curators and administrators of the assets.

If, under this, the appointment could be secured of the consul to take possession and administer, even under the control of the court, we would already have a good part of what we might expect from a new treaty with Brazil—a most desirable thing for American interests here. The only remedy is a new treaty.

I am, &c.,

JAMES R. PARTRIDGE.

Extract from the work of Pereira Pinto on "International Law and Treaties of Brazil."

[Translation.]

The cases of succession ab intestato also gave rise to discussions between the two* governments, the United States claiming that, by virtue of the first part of the thirty-third article of the present treaty, its perpetuity should be admitted as to those provisions which related to peace and friendship, and thence drawing the corollary that, because, on that principle, the clauses of the eleventh article of that treaty were perpetual, to American consuls belonged the right of collecting and administering, in conformity with the laws of their country, the estates of their countrymen dying here intestate.†

The weak argument of Minister Wise was completely answered by the notes of the imperial cabinet of the 19th, 21st, and 31st of August, 1846, in which it was established, first, that the stipulations relating to peace and friendship, contained in the thirty-third article, ought to be interpreted in the same manner as similar clauses in the treaties between the said United States and various other powers, expressed in the same kind of terms, declaring that the two nations should observe between themselves all those universal principles and rules generally established, because they protect international and individual rights, and which tend to strengthen peace and friendship between nations; and that (said clauses) did not comprehend any regulations or provisions whatever such as those which provide for the mode of collecting and administering the estates of intestates and personal property existing in the empire, in regard to which there was no express declaration by the two contracting parties; second, even if the provisions of the eleventh article of the treaty could be considered perpetual upon the ground set forth, that, even then, they did not authorize consular intervention in the collection of assets of intestate estates, but only showed a disposition not to claim the droit d'aubaine.

In consequence of these reclamations, the United States renewed, in 1849, their efforts to make a new treaty with the empire, the object of which, according to Plenipotentiary Tod, in his note of 13th of August, was to strengthen the commercial relations between the two countries, and to put an end to doubts which had been suggested in relation to the thirty-third article of the treaty of 1828.

This projet contained (as may be found in the Appendix of the Report of Foreign Relations of 1851) thirty-two (32) articles, and it was a transcript of that which had been entered into in 1828, with the exception of some provisions which gave greater extension to the consular jurisdiction in case of intestates' estates, and afforded more extensive guarantees (greater privileges) to neutrals in case of war by one of the contracting parties. Persisting, however, in its plan of deferring the negotiation of new treaties, and convinced that the laws of the country already afforded sufficient pledges of security to the development of commerce carried on by foreigners and protection to their persons and property in the same form as these were secured to its own subjects, the imperial government declined, by its note of the 22d April, 1851, to accept the said projet; and later, in 1854, by dispatch of 13th September, gave the same answer to the Envoy Trousdale when he attempted to renew similar pretensions.‡

SIR: The orçamento, or budget, relating to the expenditures and revenues of Brazil during the present and succeeding years (1874-'75)

* I. e., the United States and Brazil.

† Note of Mr. Wise to the Brazilian minister of foreign relations, 1st of July and 20th of August, 1846.

‡ In the important work which the Viscount of Uruguay published under the title of "Practical studies in relation to Provincial Administration in Brazil" are enumerated not a few cases of the suspension of the laws of the provinces (State laws) by reason of their inconsistency with treaties, or by reason of their working a change in the personal condition or mode of living of foreigners in the empire, and their attempts to impose upon them taxes and special burdens. (Vol. 2, p. 295.)

passed by the assembly just adjourned, estimates the yearly receipts at fifty-two (52) millions of dollars, and the expenditures at something more than forty-nine millions and a quarter. The estimated receipts show an expected gradual increase from both import and export dues, and the authorized expenditures are increased in proportion.

Authority is also given to the ministry in its respective departments—

1st. To re-adjust the official value (pauta) of imports upon which duties are calculated.

2d. To consolidate the additional duties (imposed during the Paraguayan war) of 5 per cent., and the further percentages of 28 and 21, into a surtax of from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. upon goods now taxed 40 per cent. to 50 per cent.

3d. To re-classify goods now taxed by weight.

4th. To continue for five years free imports and exports through Corumbá, in Matto Grosso, on the Bolivian frontier.

5th. To reduce the anchorage-dues to 200 (10 cents) reis per metric ton, levied on all foreign merchant-vessels not putting in, bringing 100 immigrants entering in franquia, (i. e., as mail-packets,) or having paid the dues six times in the year.

6th. To continue the permission to foreign vessels to engage in the larger coasting-trade.

7th. To grant fifty milreis (50$000) a ton bounty, exemption from anchorage-dues, and other favors, to home-built vessels.

8th. To permit crews of two-thirds foreigners, including master and mate.

9th. To permit Brazilians domiciled abroad to own Brazilian vessels.

10th. To relieve from export duties timber and other Brazilian materials used in repairs of foreign vessels.

11th. To reduce to one-half the taxes and expenses on salvage.

In some of these measures American commerce is interested, especially in those which propose a reform in the basis for the assessment of customs duties. I have already made known to the Department my communication to the foreign office here, complaining of some inequalities in this respect which operate to the special disadvantage of American products, and which I have asked them to correct in return for our liberality in the free admission of coffee. They have promised to give this due attention, and I will not be wanting in efforts to recall this promise to memory at the proper time.

It will be seen that the government, by these measures, has made some efforts toward a more liberal policy in respect to commerce and navigation; and if they shall lessen the present enormous charges in respect of wrecks, salvage, anchorage-dues, repairs, (export duties on timber used for such,) &c., it will be of great assistance to foreign commerce.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Rio de Janeiro, October 10, 1873. (Received November 21.)

SIR: On the 6th October, Baron Cavalcini (the Italian envoy) and myself gave our decision, as arbitrators, in the case of the reclamation of the Earl of Dundonald on this government for services rendered by his father, Admiral Lord Cochrane, during their struggle for independence.

This is an old claim, (since 1853,) and the Brazilian government had already (in 1857) paid him the full arrears of salary and pension, (suspended since 1825 for disobedience of orders;) had continued his pension (of $6,000) till his death, and to Lady Cochrane afterward.

The government also paid his son, the present claimant, about £9,450 in 1865 for prize-money unsettled. Notwithstanding these payments, Lord Dundonald claimed, for moneys retained and deducted, others; for special prize-money in the Imperatriz, ($5,000;) for interest on arrears of pension suspended, and for sundry items of prize, &c., all which, with compound interest claimed by his agent, amounted to at least six million dollars.

Lord Cochrane had offered in 1860 to receive £44,000 in full.

The arbitrators awarded him £38,675 in all, considerably more than he had any right to expect; but not one-half of what I understand the British legation thought the least possible sum, (£100,000.)

The imperial government is perfectly satisfied with the award, and all disinterested persons think we have acted with fairness and with a liberality towards the claimant which is not disapproved by the government. It would, of course, have been an additional gratification to have pleased our British colleague also. But this was a happiness we could not promise ourselves. * * * * *

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Rio de Janeiro, November 24, 1873. (Received December 22.)

SIR: At different periods during the past two years the question of a war between the Argentine Republic and the empire of Brazil has been warmly discussed by the press of both countries, and at times it seemed that open hostilities could not be much longer delayed.

Fears for the disturbance of peace were first seriously entertained in the beginning of last year, when the Brazilian treaties were negotiated with Paraguay by Baron Cotegipe, provoking the celebrated Tejedor note, which this government deemed so offensive to its dignity that explanations regarding it became an indispensable preliminary step in the negotiation of the Mitre-São Vicente agreement of November, 1872. These fears were again excited in the course of General Mitre's efforts, during the present year, to negotiate Argentine treaties with Paraguay.

And, finally, they were again stimulated more recently by reports of the object of the secret session of the Argentine congress, now being held in Buenos Ayres.

It having been reported here, among other things, that the attitude of the congress and the tone of its discussions were anything but friendly toward Brazil, and, furthermore, that one of the principal objects of the session was to pave the way for the formation of an alliance among all the South American republics against the empire, this government deemed the matter of such grave importance as to instruct Baron Araguaya, their accredited envoy at Buenos Ayres, to request information from that government respecting the truth of those reports.

A copy of the note of the Argentine minister of foreign affairs, in reply to Baron Araguaya's application, is herewith appended, together with a marginal translation. From the terms of this note it would appear that the Argentine Confederation is at the present moment animated by the most pacific of dispositions. I think this country is not less so; and, from the very nature of its political organization, as well as the peculiar social condition of the people, the empire must always stand on the defensive.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Buenos Ayres, November 3, 1873.

M. MINISTER: I had the honor to receive your note of the 31st ultimo, relating to certain rumors of war growing out of the present secret sessions of congress.

Like the imperial government, the present Argentine government considers peace as one of the greatest benefits that can fall to the lot of these regions; and your excellency may rest assured that never will a provocation to war come from the republic, nor will she enter into any treaty alliance having that for its object.

Moreover, so long as the republic is united to the empire by the bonds of that alliance which overthrew the invading power of Paraguay, this government will hold as of equal weight with those general sentiments the duty of loyalty toward Brazil, which of itself alone ought to be a sufficient guarantee to the empire that nothing will be allowed to impair those good and pacific relations now so happily existing. If we have not yet succeeded in coming to an understanding with Paraguay on the question of a boundary treaty, your excellency knows there is in this circumstance little reason for any fears of a disturbance of peace, disposed as the Argentine government is to limit itself to the execution of the remainder of the agreement of November 19th, leaving to time and future events the final acknowledgment of its rights.

I seize the opportunity, &c.,

SIR: I lately received from the Viscount de Caravellas, minister for foreign affairs, an official note, under flying seal, directed to Mr. Partridge, accompanied by the request that I would forward it to him at once, wherever he might be.

As that note conveyed the thanks of His Imperial Majesty the Em-

I had the honor to receive the note which was sent me on the 6th instant by Hon. James R. Partridge, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, and Baron A. Cavalcini, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of Italy, transmitting one of the original copies, written in French, of the sentence lately passed by them, as arbitrators, upon the claim of Earl Dundonald; also advising me that they had on the same day forwarded the other original, written in English, to Mr. Buckley Mathew, Her Britannic Majesty's minister at this court.

His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, my august sovereign, to whom I made known this communication, orders me, in his name and the name of his government, to cordially thank Mr. Partridge for the promptness and good will with which he performed the service of arbitrator in this question, and to assure him that the terms of the sentence will be strictly carried out.

Thus obeying so much of the imperial order as refers to Mr. Partridge, I will only add, that I have also addressed a note, couched in similar terms, to Baron Cavalcini.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
(Petropolis,) Rio de Janeiro, January 15, 1874. (Rec'd Feb. 23.)

SIR: During a conference which I had with the Viscount de Caravellas, at the foreign office, on the 2d instant, he said that he thought it would be well for the representatives of friendly nations to bring to the notice of their respective governments the present state of affairs here and at the river Plate. He alluded to the warlike attitude of the Argentine Confederation, spoke of the extensive armaments that were being collected at Buenos Ayres, and said it was the evident intention of the Argentines to fortify and arm the island of Martin Garcia, although such a step would be in direct violation of several treaty stipulations which provided for the free navigation of the Plate and its confluents. Among other treaties relating to the matter, he cited that one of our own Government with the Argentine Confederation negotiated in 1853, (July 10,) and prescribing the conditions for the free navigation of the rivers Parana and Uruguay.

The Viscount spoke at length of the unfortunate disposition shown by the Argentines to bring on a contest; said that the sentiment of dislike and almost hate between the two peoples was quite as strong on this side of the ocean as in the mother countries of Spain and Portugal, and that undoubtedly much capital was being made of this well-known national feeling by all parties in the conduct of the presidential campaign now in progress.

He said that Brazil would have to meet armament with armament; that such preparations would necessarily be very costly, and that whatever sums were expended in this way would be so much taken from the material development of the country. That was of course to be regretted; but Brazil could not allow herself to be surprised again as she was at the outbreak of the Paraguayan war. Then, Lopez, as the result of years of preparation, had immense stores accumulated in the country, and an army of 60,000 well-disciplined troops all ready for the conflict. To oppose this force the empire had barely 20,000 troops, and these so scattered as to require months of time to bring them into the field. That war cost Brazil 600,000 contos of reis, ($300,000,000;) and it may be safely said that the larger part of this sum may be set down to want of preparation.

He then referred to General Mitre and the cry that had lately been raised in Buenos Ayres that he was the candidate of Brazil. He said that it was true that Brazil had interested herself in the negotiation of the Argentine treaties at Assumption. This she was bound to do according to the terms of the Mitre-São Vicente agreement of November, 1872. Brazil, he said, had gone so far even as to persuade Paraguay to make certain very important concessions of territory to the Argentines, as, for instance, giving up the missions, the island of Atajo, and relinquishing that part of the Gran Chaco below the Pilcomayo, General Mitre on his side consenting to abandon the villa Occidental. Upon these bases a treaty of limits, ad referendum, was finally signed, but the Argentine congress refused to ratify; and so this vexed question of the Chaco still remains open, furnishing cause for continued dispute, irritation, and discord.

Referring to the late secret session of the Argentine congress, he said that one of the subjects then discussed was an alliance, offensive and defensive, between the Argentine Confederation, Bolivia, and Peru against Chili and Brazil. But it came to nothing. Congress, at the end of the debate, decided to take no present action.

Referring to the unusual energy just now being shown in the material development of this country, he declared that Brazil "was opening her doors on every side," as witness her action in the matter of the Madeira Railway and her more recent approval of the project for a road across the lower country to Bolivia; and, finally, speaking with much feeling, he said, "No; Brazil wants nothing from her 'neighbors,' except peace and a liberal co-operation in the great work of progress."

I assured the Viscount in return that I would make haste to transmit the substance of his remarks to my Government, which never ceased to take a lively interest in the affairs of South America, and would now learn with deep regret that there was any likelihood of a rupture of friendly relations between its two leading powers.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Rio de Janeiro, January 23, 1874. (Received Feb. 23.)

SIR: Inasmuch as the reported arming of the island of Martin Garcia, by the Argentines, was referred to by the Viscount de Caravellas in our conference of the 2d instant as a direct violation of treaty stipulations, and notably of an article in the treaty of 1853 between the United States and the Argentine Confederation; and inasmuch as it is more than likely (if the reported arming proved to be a fact) that the nations which were parties to the treaties of San José de Flores (France, England, and the United States) will be requested to take some action in the matter, I have thought it well to collate the evidence showing what has been the action of Brazil herself upon this subject under like circumstances in the past, (for the fortifying and arming of this island has already occurred several times before and been made the subject of special diplomatic negotiations,) as well as what has been the interpretation heretofore given by her to those treaty stipulations now declared to be violated.

The island of Martin Garcia is situated opposite the city of Buenos Ayres, in the River Plate, and within cannon-shot of the Oriental shore and territory.

Its true ownership is still a disputed question between the Argentine Confederation and Uruguay, although the former holds possession, and it is claimed and occupied as Argentine territory. It may more strictly, perhaps, be regarded as a part of the province of Buenos Ayres, which has always held possession of it whenever that province was separated from the Confederation; and indeed it was while Buenos Ayres was so separated from the Argentine Confederation, and holding possession of the island, that the San José de Flores treaties of 1853, and the Brazilian treaty of 1856, were negotiated with the latter government.

* Inclosures 1, 3, and 4 are translations of such parts of the several treaties as relate to the island of Martin Garcia; treaty of 1851, between Brazil and Uruguay; treaty of 1853, between the United States and the Argentine Confederation; and treaty of 1856, between Brazil and the Argentine Confederation.

Inclosures 5 and 6 are translations of so much of the reports of the Brazilian minister for foreign affairs, for 1860 and 1864, giving accounts of the negotiations and discussions which arose from the arming of the island in 1858 and 1862.

On both occasions Brazil was appealed to by the governments of Uruguay and the Argentine Confederation to interfere by force, if need be, to secure the neutralization of the island, they claiming that, by terms of Article XVIII of the treaties of 1851 and 1856, she was not only empowered but obliged to do so.

The Brazilian government, however, declined to go beyond the employment of good offices to secure the disarmament of the island, declaring that the terms of Article XVIII did not authorize her to make use of force, and that, in fact, those treaty stipulations amounted to little more than a recommendation for some future action in the matter.

* Inclosure 2 is a translation of note on Article XVIII, and its meaning is to be found at page 329 of vol. iii of Pereira Pinto's "Apontamento Para o direito Internacional."

The report of the minister for foreign affairs of Brazil, for 1864, contains the following :

The armament of this island has neither been prevented nor permitted. There was only one voice, one accord, (agreement,) between the contracting parties to obtain from that one which should be in possession of the island the consent to its neutralization in time of war.

It (Brazil) did not demand, however, nor could it demand (exigir) from that government (Buenos Ayres) the disarming of the island, the conditions of which are still to be regulated, by common agreement, between the Riverine States and the powers which signed the treaties of July 10, 1853.

The government of Buenos Ayres appears to have always claimed the right to occupy and arm the island of Martin Garcia, as though it were any other part of Argentine territory, though asserting at the same time that this was done solely as a measure of defense, and not with any view of embarrassing the free navigation of rivers.

Treaty of commerce and navigation between Brazil and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, signed at Rio de Janeiro October 12, 1851.

ART. XVIII. The high contracting parties, recognizing that the island of Martin Garcia can, by its position, serve to embarrass and impede the free navigation of the confluent of the river Plate, in which all the riverine states are interested, likewise recognize the convenience of the neutrality of that island in time of war, whether said war be carried on between the Platine States or between one of them and any other power, and this for the common good as well as a guarantee of the navigation of said rivers; and they therefore agree :

1st. In opposing, by every means in their power, that the sovereignty of the island of Martin Garcia shall pass from the possession of one of the Platine States interested in its free navigation.

2d. In soliciting the concurrence of the other Riverine States, in order to obtain from that one to which the possession and sovereignty of the island belong, or may hereafter belong, that it shall be made a matter of obligation not to use the island to embarrass the free navigation by other Riverine States; to consent to its neutrality in time of war, as well as to the formation of establishments which may be necessary for the security of the interior navigation of all the Riverine States.

Foot-note on page 324 of the third volume of the work of Antonio Pereira Pinto, entitled "Apontamentos Para o Direito Internacional," said note referring to the Brazilian interpretation of Article XVIII, translated in the preceding inclosure.

The dispositions of this article, although repeated in the treaty of March, 1856, with the Argentine Republic, and in those treaties entered into at San José de Flores in July, 1853, between that republic, France, England, and the United States, have not been observed on the part of Buenos Ayres. In 1859 that city, being separated from the rest of the confederation, and engaged in a struggle with it, proceeded to arm the island of Martin Garcia. In 1862, when the rupture of relations occurred between Uruguay and the Argentine Republic, the arming again commenced. On both occasions complaints were addressed to the imperial government, whose interference was solicited to secure the fulfillment of the stipulations set forth in existing treaties, but Brazil did no more than lend the intervention of her good offices, and it is affirmed in the report of 1864 in* regard to this matter that, by the stipulations above cited, the arming of that island was neither prevented nor permitted, inasmuch as there was but one voice—one agreement—between the parties to obtain from the state which should come into possession of the island the consent to its neutrality in time of war. If this be so, then the clause of this article (referring to the interior navigation) is an improper one to figure in an agreement treating of a political and commercial interest of so much magnitude as the non-interruption of free navigation of rivers. It should have been set forth in a manner at once clear, well defined, and obligatory.

Translation of such parts of the report of the Brazilian minister for foreign affairs for 1860 as relates to negotiations concerning the neutralization of the island of Martin Garcia, page 20.

Since the island of Martin Garcia may, by its position, serve to embarrass and impede the free navigation of the confluent of the Plate, it became the object of treaty stipulations between the Empire and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay and the Argentine Confederation.

Those stipulations form a part of conventional law established by the treaties of October 12, 1851, and March 7, 1856, and are set forth in Article XVIII of each one of them.

The government of Buenos Ayres—which was in possession of Martin Garcia when hostilities commenced between that province and the government of the confederation, established at Paraná, hostilities which have happily just come to an end, (in

* The aim of this treaty, negotiated by Messrs. Schenck and Pendleton on behalf of the United States was to determine the conditions of the free navigation of the rivers and remove the obstacles which had previously impeded it.

1859,)—fortified and armed that island with the evident intention of using it as a means of defense.

Referring to the above-mentioned stipulations and attaching to them an importance which they did not have, the Oriental and Argentine governments—and the latter more explicitly—urged that His Imperial Majesty the Emperor should insist upon the disarmament of the island, and that to accomplish it, force even should be employed, if the protest were unheeded.

The correspondence in regard to this matter appears in the notes of the Oriental minister of July 1 and August 9, of the Argentine chargé d'affaires of July 4 and August 9 and September 13, and of the imperial government of September 12.

The question which was raised merits the most serious attention. It was clear that the arming of this island would draw hostilities to that point, and so might embarrass the free navigation of the rivers in which Brazil was interested; and this being the first discussion which had arisen relative to the application of the above-mentioned treaty stipulations, it was important that no precedent should be established contrary to its true interpretation.

The imperial government studied the question conscientiously and impartially; and, being persuaded that it was not authorized to make use of force, it resolved to use persuasive means to convince the government of Buenos Ayres of the advantages of the neutralization of the island, thus avoiding any complication which might result from its armament, not only to the government of Buenos Ayres itself, but also to neutral nations, whose duty it is to protect the interests and commerce of their subjects.

That commission was intrusted to Senhor Pereira Pinto, who, with this object in view, as well as that of obtaining assurances which would tranquilize the Oriental government, as regards the attacks which it then feared, set out from this capital (Rio de Janeiro) for his post of duty on the 2d of August of last year, (1859.)

From his communications the imperial government learned with the greatest satisfaction that although the government of Buenos Ayres, fearing the armament of the island by the confederation, and wishing to avoid hostilities at that point, had resolved itself to arm that island as a measure solely of defense, nevertheless it was quite disposed to renounce that measure if it could have the guarantee that after such disarmament and neutralization on its part the same would be religiously observed by the Argentine government, Uruguay at the same time preserving her neutrality, as she had promised and as was incumbent upon her.

This disposition of the government of Buenos Ayres was seasonably communicated to the Argentine and Oriental legations; and the imperial government took occasion to express the hope that the government of the confederation would not refuse to furnish the desired guarantee.

The events which occurred in Montevideo at the time of the simultaneous presence of the Argentine and Buenos Ayres squadrons paralyzed those negotiations, and finally put an end to them shortly afterward.

The Argentine legations in Montevideo and in this capital, (Rio de Janeiro,) and the government of the confederation itself, in giving to the proceeding of the minister resident and the consul-general of the empire in Montevideo and Buenos Ayres an interpretation which was justified neither by their intentions nor by their acts, had complained of these, pretending that the island of Martin Garcia, an integral part of the Argentine territory, had been made the object of negotiation without either the consent or hearing of the national government, and that the withdrawal of its squadron from the port of Montevideo had been offered as a condition to the neutralization of the same island.

The documents annexed in their proper place explain the question. A brief statement will be sufficient here.

At the solicitations of the governments themselves of the confederation and Uruguay, the commission of Pereira Pinto had been formed. At the same time that those solicitations were urged here, the arming of Martin Garcia was going forward, and the Argentine war-vessels in Montevideo were preparing for the conflict. The armament of the island proved difficult, and so its neutralization was practically effected. Thus the passage of the ships was facilitated.

If the imperial government had not feared being unjust in its appreciation of the facts, it might have considered those solicitations in relation not to the transit of merchant-vessels, but to the Argentine war-ships. It wished, however, to be just, and so, attending to the general interests of navigation, it counseled the neutralization of the island.

Giving, however, that counsel, which amounted to the abandonment of a means of defense, it could not fail to attend to the just demand of a guarantee which should substitute it, and expressed the hope that it would be conceded.

Events were precipitated, and the Argentine ships, then confined to the waters limited by the island, made use of the Oriental ports as the base of their military operations, and committed hostilities in Buenos Ayres. From this sprung the resolution that the government of that province (Buenos Ayres) took, of ordering its squadron to the port of Montevideo, and the intimations there made, on the 24th of August, by the officer in command.

These events, all foreign to the will and action of the two agents of Brazil, made their positions difficult, endangering the issue of the commission intrusted to one, and creating conflicts in the territory where the other was accredited.

Senhor Pereira Pinto, learning what had occurred in Montevideo, and considering the assurances which the government of Buenos Ayres had given of its pacific intentions in regard to the Oriental State, judged it proper to have an understanding at once with the minister for foreign affairs, and on that occasion he was informed of the resolution which had been taken to order the squadron to return to that port (Montevideo) for the purpose of making fresh intimations.

In that conference he did all in his power to prevent hostilities being carried on in the port of Montevideo and its neighborhood, and only succeeded in obtaining a modification of the instructions given to the commander of the squadron.

At the same time he referred to the neutralization of the island, which was the business with which he had been charged, simultaneously with that of manifestations to be made in favor of the Oriental state. The result was the note which the minister of foreign affairs (of Buenos Ayres) sent him on the 27th of August, imposing certain conditions preliminary to the neutralization.

The consul-general of Brazil, however, did not compromit himself in regard to the two squadrons, as appears in the note passed to the government of Buenos Ayres, under date of the 3d of September.

It being necessary that the Brazilian minister in Montevideo should be informed at once of the resolution to which the government of Buenos Ayres had come, Senhor Pereira Pinto decided to go to that capital; and so he did, not only for the object mentioned, but also to make such representations as might prevent the Oriental government from giving to the other (Buenos Ayres) just motives of complaint in the observance of its neutrality.

The agreement of the 31st of August (1859) dissipated the conflict which was feared, and secured advantage for neutral interest which might have been prejudiced.

The neutralization of the island, however, was not effected; but peace now being concluded by virtue of the agreement of the 10th November, it is to be hoped that a practical re-union of Buenos Ayres with the other provinces of the confederation will soon be brought about, when all further doubts in regard to that object will have been removed.

[Inclosure 6 in No, 148.]

Translation of certain parts of the report of the Brazilian minister for foreign affairs for 1864, relating to the island of Martin Garcia, page 6. Principles and understanding of the conditions under which the island of Martin Garcia should be held.

The reclamation was based upon the dispositions of the Articles XVIII of the treaties of the 12th October, 1851, and of the 7th of March, 1856, between the three states.

In the first of these, the high contracting parties recognize that the said island could embarrass and impede the free navigation of the confluent of the river Plate, in which are interested all the Riverine States, and that it was desirable to preserve the neutrality of that island in time of war, whether carried on between the Platine States, or between one of them and any other power, and this for the common good, as well as the guarantee of the navigation of the said rivers.

The same guarantee was extended (tornou-se extensiva) by the treaties of San José de Flores, of 10th of July, 1853, to France, England, and the United States.

The stipulations to which I have just alluded had for their object, without prejudicing the question of dominion and sovereignty, which was still to be settled exclusively between the Platine States, to secure, so far as it was possible to do so, the neutralization of the island of Martin Garcia and prevent it from being occupied by any one of them, thus impeding the navigation of that river and of its confluent, already declared free by the most solemn treaties.

The armament of this island has neither been prevented nor permitted; there was only one voice and one agreement between the contracting parties, to obtain from that one which should be in possession of the island the consent to its neutralization in time of war.

This subject was discussed for the first time formally in 1859, when the province of Buenos Ayres, at variance with the Argentine Confederation and the republic of Uruguay, armed and fortified the island of Martin Garcia, with the manifest intention of making it the base of its military operations.

The governments of the Confederation and Uruguay, giving to this fact an international importance which it did not have, demanded of the imperial government that it should interfere for the disarmament of the island, and that it should employ even force if her protest was not heeded.

While the imperial government could not judge itself authorized, by virtue of existing treaties, to oblige Buenos Ayres to disarm and disoccupy Martin Garcia, since the obligation she had contracted by those international acts did not go so far, (pois que a tanto não se elevavão os efeitos dos * * * * *,) nevertheless, duly appreciating its importance, and recognizing that the said armament might draw to that point hostilities which could endanger the navigation and commerce of neutrals, she sought by all persuasive means to convince the government of Buenos Ayres of the advantages of its neutralization.

But this negotiation had no result. Then followed the convention of peace of November 11, 1859. The Argentine Republic was re-organized, and maintained the right to occupy and arm the island without any other limitation than (sem nenhum outro correctivo mais (o que * * *)) to make it entirely inoffensive to the free navigation of the rivers Uruguay and Parana.

In the opinion of the minister of foreign affairs of Uruguay, the position which has been lately taken by the Argentine government amounts to a standing threat against that republic, having for its natural effect to weaken the efforts which the legal government was making to suppress the revolution, and indirectly to render to the rebels powerful aid to the prejudice of its sovereignty and independence.

Taking into consideration the reclamation directed by that minister to the imperial legation in Montevideo, the imperial government did not hesitate to conform once more with the wishes of the Oriental government, soliciting explanations from the government of the Argentine Republic in regard to the matter.

It did not demand, however, nor could it demand (exigir) from that government the disarming of the island, the conditions of which were still to be regulated by common agreement between the Riverine States and the powers which signed the treaties of July 10, 1853.

In the interest of peace, and to prevent complications which could result from the armament to the Argentine government itself, the imperial government urged the propriety of removing this further element of discord from the conflicts unhappily so frequent in the Plate.

The intervention, by its good offices, of His Imperial Majesty's government in this instance seems to have been successful, resulting in the assurance given by the minister of foreign relations of the Argentine Republic in the conferences which the Brazilian minister in Buenos Ayres had with his excellency, that it was not the intention of his government to make any attempts against the sovereignty and independence of the neighboring state, nor obstruct free navigation and foreign commerce by the coercive measures which had been adopted to obtain from that state reparation for attacks made upon the Argentine nation, a matter still awaiting a friendly solution.

These measures, in the meanwhile, have not had the consequences which the government of Uruguay so much feared; the island of Martin Garcia in fact remains unarmed.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

SIR: During a conversation which I had with the Viscount de Caravellas at the foreign office on the 23d ultimo, I was informed that this government had finally resolved to take into favorable consideration the various representations which had been made to it by Mr. Partridge, from time to time during the past year; so that in the revision of the tariff, now all but completed, full regard would be shown American products, and that the article of flour in particular would be placed on a footing most favorable to our commerce.

The Viscount also intimated that his reason for thus verbally referring to the subject before the publication of the tariff was the rumor that our Congress was about to replace the tax on coffee, and he desired, therefore, that I would make known at Washington the benevolent intentions of the Brazilian government in this regard.

During another conversation which I had with the Viscount yesterday upon the same subject, I requested more precise information as to the advantages secured to American products by the revision. He could only say, however, in general, that the tax had been lightened ("alliviado") on kerosene, rosin, and flour; and he also intimated that whether the coffee-tax were put on again or not, this favorable treatment of those articles of American commerce was already an accomplished fact.

The new tariff, it is said, will shortly be published. So soon as I shall have obtained a copy and learned exactly what alterations have been made, I will refer to the matter again.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 148, of the 23d ultimo, relative to the arming of the island of Martin Garcia by the Argentine government, has been received. The statement which it contains of the stipulations of treaties upon the subject, is creditable to your diligence and intelligence. The Department is of the opinion that there is no legal right to require that government to desist from that proceeding, especially so long as it shall respect the provisions of its treaty with the United States of 1853, for the free navigation of the rivers of Parana and Uruguay.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Rio de Janeiro, March 1, 1874. (Received April 27.)

SIR: The struggle between the ecclesiastical and civil powers in Brazil begins to assume an aspect of grave political importance.

After the receipt of the papal bull of the 29th of May last, applauding the course of the bishop of Olinda in interdicting the various religious brotherhoods of his diocese, because they declined to expel, upon his order, those of their members who were Free-Masons, all the other bishops took open stand against the government. One after another they publicly announced it as their resolute purpose to faithfully obey any and all instructions which His Holiness might send them, being firmly convinced that, though Brazilians, their first allegiance was due to Rome.

Thus the government was forced to the adoption of extreme measures, and since the opposition of the bishop of Olinda had been more vigorous and even defiant than that of any of his colleagues, he having persistently refused to obey the resolution of the council of state of the 12th of June, it was finally resolved to bring that prelate to trial.

It had been decided in September to take this step, but three months passed away before the preliminary legal forms of citation, response, and indictment had been concluded, and then it was announced that the supreme tribunal of justice had found a true bill, charging the bishop with an unbailable offense. His arrest was immediately ordered, and early in January he was brought to the capital and confined in the arsenal of marine. The trial began on the 18th ultimo, amid much public interest, and on the following 21st resulted in the conviction of the accused, who was condemned, under article 96 of the criminal code, to four years' imprisonment at hard labor.

As the terms of the sentence present a clear and succinct view of the main points in dispute between the civil and ecclesiastical powers in Brazil, I give the text in full :

Considering that the brotherhoods are associations of a mixed nature ; that the temporal and spiritual powers alike concur in their organization, the statutes being approved in their spiritual part by the prelates, and confirmed by the government or by the provincial assemblies, (law of Sept. 28, 1828, art. 2, § 11,) and therefore subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction in their spiritual part, and to the civil and temporal jurisdiction in all their exhibits ;

Considering that the qualifications required for persons to belong to such associations are not an object of a spiritual nature ; considering it is indispensable that, besides the will of the founders, the two powers should concur in the establishment of regulations which are to govern these associations and to fix the rights and obligations of its members, such regulations cannot be reformed or altered by one alone of the two powers, without the co-operation of the other and the intervention of the brotherhood. (Resolution of the council of state, January 15, 1867 ;)

Considering that the declaration that a certain class, or individuals, are incapable of belonging to such associations, for reasons not set forth in the regulations, amounts to a reform or alteration of them ;

Considering that the accused ordered the Board of the Brotherhood of the Most Holy Sacrament of the parish of Santo Antonio to expel from its body a certain and determined person because he belonged to the society of Free-Masons, an association permitted by the laws of the empire ; ordering likewise the expulsion of all other members who were in the same situation ;

Considering that when the brotherhood refused to carry out such order, as being contrary to its engagements, the accused launched the penalty of interdiction, without proceeding to any inquiry, or even hearing the interested parties ;

Considering that in this proceeding the accused usurped the jurisdiction of the temporal power, and, furthermore, used notorious violence in the exercise of the spiritual power, ignoring, in the imposition of the very grave penalty of interdiction, natural right and the canons of the Brazilian church, which do not allow the condemnation of any one without a hearing, and without the observance of the rules of defense ;

Considering that when the appeal to the Crown, authorized by decree 1911, of March 28, 1857, in conformity with preceding legislation, was taken, the accused denied its legality, and when the said appeal was decided, and the imperial resolution transmitted to the accused to be carried out, he not only disobeyed it, but incited the vicars to do the same, threatening them with the penalty of suspension "ex informata conscientia," of which one who showed hesitation was a victim ;

Considering that the accused, who, as a public employé, (additional act to the constitution of the empire, art. 10, § 7,) should, in his high position, have been prompt and solicitous to fulfill, and cause his subordinates to fulfill, the laws of the country, rendered his formal refusal to obey a lawful order still graver by going so far as to declare heretical the matter of appeal to the Crown and the placet. (See his note of June 6, 1873 ;)

Considering, lastly, that, for the reasons set forth, the present case is within the jurisdiction of the tribunal, and that the accused has by his course impeded and prevented the due effects of the order of the executive which were contained in those resolutions, as is fully proved in the papers, the court judges that the bishop, D. Vital Maria Gonçalves de Oliveira, has incurred the penalty of article 96 of the criminal code, and so sentence him to four years of imprisonment with labor and costs.

Article 96 of the criminal code reads as follows :

Obstructing or preventing in any manner the effect of decisions of the moderative or executive powers, which are conformable to the constitution and the laws. Penalty : Imprisonment at hard labor for from two to six years.

The conviction of the bishop of Olinda had been generally anticipated ; yet when the fact became known and began to be realized, the public sentiment was shocked. Never before in the history of Brazil had a prince of the church been condemned to prison like a common felon! There was at once a strong revulsion of popular feeling, and, judging by the present tone of the daily press, a ministerial crisis is not far off. If not a complete dissolution, a modification, at least, of the present ministry is expected, since its members appear unable to agree upon the course to be pursued with the condemned bishop; some being in favor of granting him a full pardon, and others insisting upon the commutation of the sentence to simple imprisonment.

When it was decided in September last to bring the bishop of Olinda to trial, it was decided at the same time to send a special mission to Rome. That mission was confided to Baron Penedo, the Brazilian envoy at London; and its object, as set forth in the foreign minister's instructions, was to persuade "the Pope to cease encouraging the bishops in their disobedience," and "to counsel them rather to proceed in conformity with the constitution and laws." The envoy was also distinctly told that "the bishop of Olinda would be brought to trial, and that even other more energetic legal measures would be adopted, if found necessary, whatever might be the result of the mission." Finally, he was instructed to "use moderate but firm language," and to represent that "the imperial government did not ask a favor, but only claimed what was just."

The result of Baron Penedo's mission, which terminated in November, has, I believe, until very recently, been regarded as satisfactory by this government. It consisted of a note from the cardinal secretary, "deploring the grave conflict that had arisen between the civil and ecclesiastical powers in Brazil," and stating that His Holiness was "disposed to adopt those measures which, in his wisdom and paternal benevolence toward Brazilian Catholics, he should judge opportune to bring that conflict to a close; expecting, however, that the imperial government on its part would concur for the removal of all obstacles tending to retard the accomplishment of the desired end."

Baron Penedo also states that he was shown a letter addressed to the bishop of Olinda, censuring his course and instructing him to recall his pastorals interdicting the various brotherhoods of his diocese. This letter, of which the Brazilian envoy does not seem to have obtained a copy, was forwarded through the internuncio here, and reached the bishop of Olinda when he was already confined as a prisoner in the arsenal of marine. That letter has not yet been published, and it is asserted, furthermore, that this government has not yet been able to obtain a copy.

That the results of Baron Penedo's mission are not now regarded here with the same satisfaction as at first, may be inferred from the fact that a new agent, already in Rome, has been instructed to use his good offices in convincing the Holy See of Brazil's continued loyalty to the Church.

Thus the "religious question" bids fair to occupy the chief attention of the chambers during the next session. Various practical reforms, it is said, will be brought forward, and some of them may become laws, since it is hardly to be supposed that so much discussion will be allowed to result in nothing.

There are those even who look for the separation of the Church from the state, but the adoption of so radical a measure is hardly probable now. It would be more reasonable to hope for the legalization of civil marriage, or a civil registry, or the secularization of cemeteries, or possibly for the revocation of that singular clause of the constitution which provides that houses constructed for the worship of other religions than the Roman Catholic "shall" not have the exterior form of a "temple."

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

(Petropolis,) Rio de Janeiro, March 24, 1874. (Received April 21.)

SIR: Notwithstanding the hope and belief here that the unsatisfactory relations with the Argentine Republic may not finally end in a war, the Brazilian fleet in the Plate has been re-enforced, now numbering ten vessels, under one of their chief naval commanders; recruiting is incessant, and it is evident from the other preparations that this government is desirous of being able at once to strike an effective blow, or a rapid series of them, in case the necessity should overtake them.

There is still no Argentine legation here, and it is thought by many who know the temper and disposition of Mr. Magalhaes, Baron Araguaya, that those qualities in the Brazilian minister there would not lean to concession.

To the complaints made by each of the parties against the other, arising out of the Brazilo-Paraguayan treaties, the continued occupation of Villa Occidental, and the armed occupation by the Argentines of the island of Martin Garcia, (in alleged violation of the guaranteed neutrality of the Plate, mentioned in Mr. Shannon's No. 147,) are to be added, on the part of a large party in Buenos Ayres, the disappointment at the non-election of General Mitre to the Presidency, the success in the election there (though disputed) of Alsina, and the hopes of all the disappointed candidates and their friends that a declaration of war might bring about a revolution in the Argentine Republic, and so aid the chances of some one of those chiefs.

It is clear to any one who knows the want of resources on both sides to carry on a war, that that fact alone ought to be sufficient to prevent it; but every such person also knows that such a condition of affairs is very far from being a reason here; in fact, it often is a reason to them for proceeding.

These threatenings of war have been very much believed in by the ministers of England and France, and there is reason to suppose that in consequence of their representations to their governments, they have been instructed to offer their mediation in case war should come.

One would suppose, however, from the former experience of the Anglo-French mediation in affairs of the River Plate Republic, (1838-1850,) that they, or at least England, would hesitate before getting again into such a business.

Since there is no United States minister there at present, I will endeavor to keep you informed of events there, as well as here, which bear upon this matter.

It has been said here by a person high placed in the government, that in case Brazil should find war inevitable, they would be in favor of the questions being referred for decision to the President of the United States.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

(Petropolis,) Rio de Janeiro, April 9, 1874. (Received May 26.)

SIR: The Buenos Ayres journals are still filled with abuse of the Brazilian government, and inflammatory appeals to the Argentine population to carry on a war, which, by its results, shall put an end to Brazilian dictatorship in Paraguay, and to Brazilian pretensions (as they say) to regulate matters in the River Plate.

There can be no doubt that there is an intense hostility among the Argentines toward Brazil; and that a large portion of the population, outside of Buenos Ayres particularly, is in favor of a war. The commercial interests in Buenos Ayres, Rosario, and the principal towns, and the large foreign influence in the former especially, are too well informed and have too much at stake, to be willing to run the risks of the only result which they know such a war could have.

It is doubtless true, also, that a great deal of the warlike talk of the newspapers, and of many of their public men, is due to the fact that the election (for the college which is to name the President) takes place in June; and that the result of those elections for Congress already had seems to show that the candidate of the party supposed to be in favor of a war with Brazil has more chance of success. These results seem to foreshadow the triumph of Avellaneda (since Alsina has promised to retire in his favor) and the defeat of General Mitre, who is declared by his opponents to be the Brazilian candidate because he is in favor of peace.

It is not easy, therefore, to say how much reliance ought to be placed upon these threats, and how much of the war cry is to be attributed to political motive.

The fact remains, however, that the Argentines are very busy arming, purchasing war-material; buying war-vessels; attempting to organize a navy; fortifying their positions along the river; and have actually diverted a very large portion of the proceeds of a late loan effected in London, to be used in the construction of railroads, for the purchase of cannon and accoutrements.

These things, with the tone of the press in Buenos Ayres, and no doubt the assurances they receive from the Brazilian minister there, have induced this government to move in earnest, and to make the most effective preparations in case such war should be declared by the Argentines.

I think it beyond question, both from the assurances of this Government, from their financial condition, and the public feeling here, that Brazil has no intention or wish to engage in such a war. This empire is progressing rapidly, compared with what has been its progress heretofore. Their coffee planters are getting rich with the enormous prices they receive, and the public revenues from export and import dues are far in advance of what they could have even hoped for. They are building railroads and increasing their merchant marine, and the remembrance of the depreciation of their currency, of their losses and sacrifices during the Paraguayan war, renders them utterly unwilling to undertake any new one.

But they are determined not to be caught unprepared. They are making every preparation of their navy, (which is respectable,) and especially overhauling their gunboats, which did such service in the river during that war.

In case war should be declared by the Argentines, we may look at once, I think, for a prompt and efficient blockade of Buenos Ayres and the Parana. The naval commission has already declared in fit condition for active service some twenty-one (21) of their steamers and gunboats.

My own impression is, however, that there will be no war. Brazil does not desire it, and the war-cry in the Argentine Republic is, from what I can learn, part of a political scheme to defeat General Mitre.

It is so clearly the interest of the Uruguayans to remain neutral and to reap the commercial advantages of such a position, that their journals plainly see and advise such a course.

I annex a clipping from the "Nation," here, (ministerial journal,) taken from the "Uruguay," which I think truly states the case.

Translation of the annexed clipping from the "Nação" of Rio de Janeiro of March 27, 1874.

In Montevideo has appeared a new journal called "El Uruguay." Its editors, for the political part, are Messrs. Charles de Castro and Bonifacio Martinez. In an article of that journal, which is headed "Neutrality and War," we find the following:

"For those who reflect, even superficially, upon what is going on in the River Plate, a war between Brazil and the Argentine Republic is imminent.

"The spirit of the Argentine people is in favor of war, and it is easily explained.

"The empire exercises a powerful influence in Paraguay. Only the other day, the civil war which had broken out in Paraguay was ended by the mediation of a Brazilian minister. This alliance must exist as long as the Argentines shall occupy the Villa Occidental—an occupation which was the act of an unwise policy.

"Besides this, there is the antagonism of race and the inherited antipathy between Brazilians and Argentines; there is the remembrance of Itazuingo; and finally, the contempt which all Argentines feel for the Brazilians.

"The Argentines wish to break down the Brazilian influence, and to wash their hands in the face of the world of the great mistake of the triple alliance.

"Diplomacy is at work, not to come to an agreement, but to manage alliances.

"The Argentine Republic sends two ministers, one to Bolivia and one to Peru.

"On the other hand, Brazil, which has been looked upon since the Paraguayan war by all the South American republics with distrust, sends to Chili one of her ablest diplomats, who (Mr. Aguiar de Andrada) by force of hard work and unwearied perseverance, has actually succeeded in doing away with the suspicious feelings existing in Chili toward Brazil, and since then the notes exchanged between those governments are of the most friendly and benevolent expressions; in fact, of a profound affection."

The article concludes by saying that in case of a war the Oriental Republic ought to maintain a strict neutrality.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

(Petropolis,) Rio de Janeiro, April 16, 1874. (Received May 21.)

SIR: In my No. 108 (April 24, 1873) I sent to the Department a copy (annex) of a note I addressed, at that time, to the foreign office here, in view of the then proposed revision of the Brazilian tariff, in which I showed the greatly exaggerated pauta or custom-house valuation of imports from the United States into Brazil; the heavy duties, both export and import, levied by Brazil on that commerce; and begged that, in the proposed revision and correction, the liberality of the United States in abolishing the duty on coffee, inuring to the very great advantage of this country, might be responded to by a reciprocal lowering, at least, of those heavy duties here.

At various times since then the Viscount de Caravellas has said to me that they hoped this could be and would be done in the new tariff.

This last, to go into effect after the 1st July next, has just been published, (31 March,) and of which I will send a copy as soon as a suitable one can be procured.

On considering its provisions, I was surprised, after what they had said, to find that there was to be no diminution whatever in the (pauta) valuation or duty on any article from the United States, except a small reduction in that on kerosene, which is largely imported.

On lard there is to be actually an increased duty of $\frac{17}{20}$ of a cent per pound, making the whole duty (new) equal to $4\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound.

On the following articles there is no change, viz :

Flour remains at 987 reis, i. e., 52 to 54 cents, per barrel.

Lumber about $7 per 1,000 feet.

Rosin at $1.15 per barrel.

Turpentine about $9\frac{1}{2}$ cents per gallon.

In view of this, and hoping that there still remains an opportunity, before the 1st July, to have some return for our liberality, I addressed a note on the 15th instant to the Viscount de Caravellas, of which the annex hereto is a copy.

Certainly so excellent an opportunity for this Government to do something for the benefit of our interests, and in return for what has been done for theirs in the United States, ought not to be allowed to pass; and still hoping that I may be able to accomplish something in this direction, for which I have been making efforts ever since my first arrival, I trust this note and what I have done may meet your approval.

[Inclosure.]

Mr. Partridge to Viscount de Caravellas.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Petropolis, April 15, 1874.

On the 16th April, 1873, I had the honor of addressing his excellency the Viscount de Caravellas, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, a note touching the condition of the commercial relations between the United States and Brazil, showing the very large amount of export duty levied on the coffee of Brazil exported to the United States, (three-fifths of the whole Brazilian crop;) the exaggerated pauta and high import duties levied on articles imported into Brazil from the United States, whereby the great inequality of commercial movement (of products) between the United States and Brazil was increased, or at any rate prevented from finding its proper reciprocity, and a positive impediment was placed to the development of interchanges which it is the interest of both countries to promote.

In that note I also called the attention of the minister of foreign affairs to the fact that the duty on coffee imported into the United States (3 cents per pound) has been abolished, and that the whole of the difference in price resulting had inured to the benefit of the producers of coffee (fazendeiros) in Brazil.

In that note I also gave tables and statistics, showing, incontestably, the large receipts and financial advantages resulting to the imperial treasury from the duties (both import and export) levied on that commerce, and demonstrated the percentage of the imperial customs-revenues levied on the commerce with the United States alone.

I made these statements for the purpose of inviting the attention of the imperial government to those facts in view of the then proposed revision of the pauta and tariff on imports; and I would respectfully invite again, in connection with this communication, the attention of the minister of foreign affairs to that note of the 16th April, 1873.

The receipt of that note was acknowledged on the 29th of May, 1873, (D. G. 2060,) and it was stated that his excellency the Viscount de Rio Branco, minister of fazenda, to whom it had been sent, would take its statements into full consideration; but that no steps could be taken then, nor until the legislative body had fixed the bases of the projected reform in the custom-house tariff.

Since then, at several interviews, his excellency the minister of foreign affairs has been good enough to say to me that the statements of that note (April 16, 1873) were receiving due attention; and that it was hoped that in the new tariff which would be promulgated after the report of the commission of review had been made, there would be such a satisfactory re-adjustment of duties on articles (the produce of the United States) imported into Brazil as would respond to the liberality of the United States in wholly abolishing the duty on the great Brazilian product.

I have since seen, by a decree lately published, that the new tariff has been adopted on the report of the commission, and that it will go into effect on and after the 1st of July next.

I had hoped, from what the minister of foreign affairs had stated to me, to find in this new tariff very large reductions, both in the pauta and in the rate of duty, upon articles the produce of the United States; but after reading the report and inspecting the proposed tariff I regret to be obliged to say that it appears there is to be no reduction of duty, except on one article, (kerosene;) a large increase on another, (lard;) no change in all the rest; and that thus there will be no adequate response to the liberality of the United States tariff toward Brazilian products.

If the report and project of law shows the duties to be levied on articles from the United States after the 1st July next, then the Government of the United States will be grievously disappointed in its just expectations, after the representations I have made to Washington, based on the assurances of his excellency the minister of foreign affairs to me.

In order to show the small extent of the relief in one case and the aggravated duty in another to be expected under the new (proposed) tariff, I append a table showing the late, present, and proposed duties on six articles the produce of the United States, and which constitute the great bulk of imports from the United States into Brazil:

Names of articles imported into Brazil chiefly of the produce of the United States.	Old duty, 1873, before the reduction of percentages.	Present duty, 1874, after reduction of the extra percentage.
Flour, per kilogram.....	8 reis and 78 per cent	8 reis and 40 per cent.
Equal to, per barrel.....	1$255.....	987 reis.
Lumber, per square meter....	100 reis, 28 per cent. and one-sixth	100 reis and 40 per cent.
Equal to, per 1,000 feet...	13$444.....	13$010.
Kerosene, per kilogram	120 reis, 28 per cent. and one-sixth	120 reis and 40 per cent.
Equal to, per 10 gallons ..	5$087.....	4$922.
Lard, per kilogram	120 reis, 28 per cent. and one sixth.....	120 reis and 40 per cent.
Equal to, per pound.....	80 reis	77 reis.
Rosin, per kilogram.....	15 reis and 28 per cent. and one-sixth..	15 reis and 40 per cent.
Equal, to per barrel.....	2$207.....	2$142.
Turpentine, per kilogram	40 reis, 28 per cent. and one-sixth	40 reis and 40 per cent.
Equal to, per 10 gallons ..	1$850.....	1$792.
	New duty under proposed tariff in force after July 1, 1874.	Remarks.
Flour, per kilogram.....	8 reis and 40 per cent.. }	No change.....	{ Equal to 52 to 54 cts. per barrel.
Equal to, per barrel.....	987 reis..... }
Lumber, per square meter ...	100 reis and 40 per cent. }	No change.....	{ Equal to $6.90 per 1,000 feet.
Equal to, per 1,000 feet...	13$010..... }
Kerosene, per kilogram	80 reis and 40 per cent. }	A reduction of 56 reis per kilogram.	{ Duty (new) equal to $1.73 per box of 10 gallons.
Equal to, per 10 gallons...	3$281..... }
Lard, per kilogram.....	150 reis and 40 per cent. }	An increase of 17-20ths of a cent. per pound, 42 reis per kilogram added.	Duty (new) is equal to 4½ cents per pound.
Equal to, per pound.....	95 reis..... }
Rosin, per kilogram.....	15 reis and 40 per cent. }	No change.....	$1.15 per barrel.
Equal to, per barrel.....	2$142..... }
Turpentine, per kilogram....	40 reis and 40 per cent. }	No change.....	{ 95 cents per box of 10 gallons.
Equal to, per 10 gallons ..	1$792..... }

From this table it thus appears: 1st. That in the articles of flour, lumber, rosin, and turpentine no change whatever in the rate or amount of duty is to take place; 2d. That in the article of lard there is, so far from benefit, on the contrary, an aggravation of or addition to the duty of 42 reis (equal to $\frac{1}{10}$ of a cent per pound increase) per kilogram; and that on the single article of kerosene there is a proposed deduction of only 56 reis per kilogram, (equal to 1 cent per pound, or 40 cents per box containing 10 gallons, decrease) below the present duty; and that, the proposed new rate of duty on kerosene, (112 reis in all per kilogram, 80 reis+40%) is equal to nearly 75 per cent. ad valorem on its cost in the United States.

I am persuaded that his excellency the minister of foreign affairs will agree to the assertion that these proposed new duties do not exhibit the liberal spirit toward the products of the United States which that Government, after its own course with regard to coffee, had a fair right to expect.

By the abolition of the duty on coffee the United States gave up a very large revenue, (nine millions of dollars,) nearly eighteen thousand contos of reis. The result was, as might have been expected in every case of such reduction, a very large increase in the consumption of coffee, and especially of the coffee of Brazil. And it cannot be doubted that, in like manner, a liberal reduction of duty in Brazil on the produce of the United States would result in a very large increase in their consumption here, so that, while the duty was lessened, the movement and imports would be so largely increased that the imperial treasury would receive still larger sums from lower rates of duty.

It is hardly necessary for me to do more than present this table for the consideration of the imperial government. Nor is there any necessity for me to speak of the advantages which must result to both countries from a just and liberal reciprocity in their respective tariffs toward the products of the other. These things are now well understood, and, the advantages being admitted, the question with every government is, how far the condition of the country and the results to its treasury will admit of the application of a principle which will be followed by acknowledged benefits.

Of its own necessities and policy, of course, the imperial government is the best judge; and it rests with that government alone to say what shall be the measure and amount of the duties it proposes to levy on its imports. But the wonderful progress which has been made in Brazil in these late years, and the enlightened and liberal policy which the imperial government has pursued in the removal of the additional percentages, in the abolition of vexatious delays in entering, loading, and clearing the mail-steamers, and in the removal of many obstacles to prompt dispatch, and with such manifest advantage and increase to the commerce of the empire—all these things easily induce every well-wisher of Brazil to believe that the imperial government is willing to continue to adopt all such liberal proceedings as may cause its still further development and increase.

These considerations had given rise to what I have called the just expectations of the Government of the United States, in view of the proposed re-adjustment of its tariff by Brazil; and that Government entertained certainly a reasonable expectation that, in view of what had taken place, such a reduction in the duties on the articles named would be accorded by the imperial government in acknowledgment and return for the entire abolition in the United States of the duty on coffee. Yet it has been shown by the table above given that on four of the principal articles (flour, lumber, rosin, turpentine) which come from the United States no change whatever has taken place; on one important article (lard) a very heavy addition has been made to the present duty, and that on one article alone (kerosene) a reduction has been accorded, which yet leaves the proposed new duty equal to three-fourths or more of the prime cost.

The hope is still entertained, since the new tariff does not begin until the 1st of July next, that the imperial government may yet be induced to lower the duties on all these articles.

It is understood, of course, that the imperial government has the power to modify its own decree; and since it certainly was in its power to adopt, alter, or reject any portion of the recommendations of the commission of review, it appears equally competent to make now any further alteration or modification which it may think well to establish.

I trust that his excellency the minister of foreign affairs will agree with me that so excellent an opportunity of responding to the liberality of the Government of the United States ought not to be allowed to pass without such action on the part of the imperial government as could not fail to assure the United States of the desire of Brazil to further, in every just and practicable way, the most important commerce which this country holds with any other one nation; and which could not fail also to strengthen and make lasting the very friendly relations and commercial alliance between the two principal powers on the American continent.

It will be easily understood, of course, that I do not ask that this reduction shall be made expressly, as of duties upon articles because the produce of the United States, since, if that were done, by that name, it might give rise to exigencies of other countries asking for themselves (without any such reason as exists in the case of the United States) an equal reduction on other articles because the products of their respective countries, when those countries had not only not abolished and reduced, but have actually increased, their duties on Brazilian products.

To avoid all such inconvenience it is respectfully suggested—in case the imperial government still has the disposition to respond to the liberality of Brazil's largest customer, and it be still in the power of this government to modify its own decree—that there might be made such reductions in the duty on the articles named above as would accomplish this desire of both governments.

In again urgently inviting the attention of his excellency the minister of foreign affairs to this very important matter, which, if it can be accomplished, will be one of the most welcome things that could be reported to Washington from Brazil, I avail myself of the opportunity to renew to his excellency, the minister of foreign affairs, the assurances of my complete esteem and consideration.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

SIR: There is very little change to be reported in the aspect of the relations between Brazil and the Argentine Republic.

The journals here still insist that the republic is only awaiting the arrival of their expected steamers and armaments to begin; and that the feeling of hostility there has increased since the failure of the late Argentine intrigue at Asuncion to displace by a revolution there the Paraguayan President, Zovellanos, who, the Argentines declare, is only a Brazilian proconsul.

It appears, in fact, that the superior Brazilian influence in Paraguay is the root of bitterness for the Argentines, and that the late revolt attempted at Asuncion (where there is still a Brazilian garrison) was plotted across the river, in the Chaco, (Villa Occidental,) still occupied by an Argentine force.

In conversation to-day with the director-general of the foreign office I learned that they are still awaiting a reply from Dr. Tejedor, the minister of foreign relations at Buenos Ayres, to the last Brazilian note; and I suppose from some expressions that they still think war may come, and that it is even probable.

This has been so long and so often threatenend, however, during the last three years, that many think it will pass now, as heretofore, without any further consequence than an increase of the old hostile feeling; and I should imagine, from what several persons here from Buenos Ayres, with whom I have conversed have told me, that the Argentine government is hardly rash enough to undertake such business.

The armaments here continue, and Brazil has already a respectable force in those waters.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Rio de Janeiro, May 19, 1874. (Received June 20.)

SIR: The Brazilian government is constant in its efforts to promote the construction of railways into the interior, and lately several decrees have been published guaranteeing 7 per cent. (net) dividend for a term of years to the stockholders of various companies about to undertake these enterprises from various points along the coast into the agricultural regions of the interior, from which the produce still comes by the slow, expensive, and insufficient means of carriage on the backs of mules.

With these government guarantees it has not been, hitherto, difficult to find, in England, the capital and to organize the companies, which have already, upon similar grants, constructed railways from Santos, (St. Paul,) Pernambuco, and other points.

Efforts have been made also to induce this government to issue bonds, or guarantee interest on new bonds of the Madeira and Marmoré Railway Company, (Bolivian Navigation Company,) but there has been no disposition hitherto here to assist (financially) the enterprise.

In this connection it may be interesting to the Department to know that the Trans-Andine Railway, from ports of Peru to the head of navigation on the southern affluents of the Amazons, is steadily progressing, and will, in all probability, shortly be consummated, through the energy of Mr. Henry Meiggs, an American citizen, who builds it under contract with Peru.

Annexed is a (clipping from an Argentine newspaper) letter from Pará, which gives some account of this work. It states the whole distance from the port of Callao, on the west coast, to the head of navigation (down the Peruvian affluents) at Oroya, within the Brazilian frontier, to be only one hundred and sixty-seven miles, (which must be a mistake, perhaps "leagues" is meant,) passing, in that short distance, the great Cordillera of the Andes through a tunnel at the height of 15,000 feet above the sea.

In this connection, also, it may be stated that the Amazons Navigation Company, having (virtually) a monopoly under a grant to Baron Maná, and by him transferred to an English company, have lately much improved their steamers, engaged in the navigation from Pará up the river, both in speed and accommodation. Several new iron steamers of very light draught, with well-ventilated cabins, &c., on the American (western) model, have been built in Wilmington, Del., and sent out for that company.

Even when the Trans-Andine Railway shall be completed to Oroya, and the navigation service of the upper affluents be organized, it will be, probably, for some time a question whether freight will be cheaper to Peru by that route than as at present by the steamers of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company, which run from Liverpool to Callao in forty days, touching at Lisbon, Pernambuco, Rio, Montevideo, thence through the Straits of Magellan to Valparaiso and Callao.

(From the Buenos Ayres Standard.)

Important from the Amazons.—Railway from Peru to Brazil.

PARÁ, April 6.

The Trans-Andine railway from Peru to the Amazons progresses rapidly, and will soon connect the Brazilian frontier with the west coast. It starts from the port of Callao, and after 30 miles begins to ascend the mountains, passing several ruins of cities of the Incas. At San Bartolome, 45 miles from Callao, the line attains an elevation of 5,000 feet. The viaduct of Varrujas passes through the grandest mountain scenery till reaching Lurco, after which it leaps the defile of Challapa by a bridge 160 feet high and 224 feet span.

Between Tambo Viso and Chicla the railway picks its way through awful precipices where it would seem impossible to bring a locomotive, there being 30 bridges and viaducts in this section, and 35 tunnels, the longest 1,290 yards in length; the curves in some places are in the form of a V, and when we reach the awful chasm of Chacahuare you hear the roar of the water-fall at a great depth below. Next comes the Infernillo defile, where the Rimac is a stream of 130 feet wide, falling over a cascade of 170 feet. This is passed by a tunnel to the edge of the cliff, then a bridge 200 feet in height, after which the train enters another tunnel, till again reappearing to the light of day, and still steadily ascending. The Rio Blanco defile being passed the line is carried over a viaduct 330 feet long and 250 high, again across the Rimac, and we reach Chicla. All this country is so rich in minerals that the railway is sure to revive the abandoned mines of the last century.

From Chicla to Summit Tunnel the ascent is easy, although there is an incline of 1 in 25, which is surmounted by 6 bends, the last at the Chinchán defile, being 5 miles long, and the scenery here of the wildest and most savage aspect. The brightness of the snow is distressing to the eyes. The air is so rarefied at this height that you breathe with difficulty, and at last, at Antaranga, we enter Summit Tunnel, 15,000 feet over the sea, and 106 miles distant from Callao. This is nearly 3 times as high as the greatest elevation of the American and San Francisco railway over the Rocky Mountains, (6,000 feet.)

The descent on the Brazilian side is easy, till reaching the little village of Oroya, which gives its name to this wonderful railway. Oroya is 136 miles from the port of Callao, and stands 12,100 feet over sea-level. The last section of the line from Oroya to the Amazons, 31 miles, is now approaching completion. Thus the whole length will be 167 miles, and travelers or merchandise can then be conveyed by steam from Brazil up the Amazons and over to the west coast, or vice versa.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Rio de Janeiro, May 20, 1874. (Received June 20.)

SIR: On the 5th instant the session of the legislative chambers was opened by a speech from the Throne, a translation of which is hereto annexed.

It will be seen that this time the Rio Branco ministry have not followed their own example on previous occasions, and made no allusion to all the most important events or measures of the year.

They were obliged to speak of the ecclesiastical question, in which they have triumphed, but have nothing to say on the question of civil marriage, which has formed part of that discussion, nor of the attitude of the Argentine Republic, which has taken up most attention since the trial of the bishops.

Since then nothing has been done, because the ministry finds itself with a bare majority of one or two, and which threatens to disappear, so that no measure of importance or reform that was needed and promised has been brought forward or discussed.

When the ministerial party find, at a session, that their members are not all present, they depart, so as to leave the chambers without a quorum, so that an adjournment till next day takes place, which is repeated on the morrow if the steamer on which some of their adherents are to arrive has not come in.

Meantime we hear less talk of war from Buenos Ayres, where the result of the election for president is still in doubt. Here, however, they think this is only a delay on the part of the Argentines; so the naval armaments continue, and every vessel of the Brazilian navy is put in order for service.

The Argentine consul-general (chargé ad interim) informs me that he thinks there is no adequate cause for all this preparation here for defense, and regards it as a threat on this side which may bring about the thing they profess to wish to avoid. From what he as well as others from there tell me, and from the experience we have had of this war-cry for now three years, I am inclined to think that there is every day less probability of war, as I have already informed the Department. The message of the Argentine president to the chambers just opened in Buenos Ayres also appears to confirm this hope.

It is said that in case the present ministry should find itself without a majority, there might be some change in its composition, perhaps of leaders, so as to go on with the present house; for it is believed that the Emperor is unwilling to grant a dissolution, being anxious that the proposed electoral reforms should be adopted so as to govern any new election.

The chances, however, seem to be that the Viscount Rio Branco will remain; and, perhaps, the reduction of the export duty, (from 9 per cent. to 7 per cent.,) which he told me he intended to propose in favor of cotton and sugar, may assist it.

I am, &c.,

JAMES R. PARTRIDGE.

Speech of the Emperor of Brazil at the opening of the Legislative Chambers, May, 1874.

[From the Anglo Brazilian Mail May 22.—Translation.]

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.— OPENING OF THE SESSION, 1874, (MAY.)

The legislative session of this year was opened May 5, by His Majesty the Emperor, with the following speech:

August and most worthy representatives of the nation:

Your meeting is always to me a matter of rejoicing and well-based trust.

Thanks to Divine Providence, the public peace has remained unshaken, and Brazil prospers under the influence of this great benefit.

The last news I had from my beloved daughter, the Princess Imperial, Countess d'Eu, brought me the grateful certainty of her pregnancy. In this case she ought to return to Brazil, in fulfillment of one of the conditions of the matrimonial contract, but perhaps she may find herself obliged to avoid so long a journey, in compliance with the opinion of medical authorities.

The sanitary state of many points of the empire has not been satisfactory, but the sufferings of the people have been attenuated by the assistance of the state and private charity.

Our international relations have not been altered, and the government is trying to draw them still closer by bonds of friendship and reciprocal interests.

The definite agreements of peace between the Argentine Republic and that of Paraguay have not yet been concluded; it is to be hoped, however, that they will be so, pacifically and amicably. With this object we have given our ally the co-operation we are bound to by the agreement of November 19, 1872.

Exchange has been made of the ratifications of a consular convention with Great Britain, of a treaty of extradition with Belgium, and of a postal convention with the Argentine Republic.

The procedure of the bishops of Olinda and Pará has subjected them to the judgment of the supreme tribunal of justice. This fact has caused me great sorrow, but it became requisite that so grave an offense to the constitution and laws should not remain unpunished.

Firm in its purpose to maintain the national sovereignty intact, and to guard the rights of citizens against the excesses of ecclesiastical authority, the government counts on your support; and, without abandoning the moderation employed till now, shall succeed in putting an end to a conflict as injurious to social order as it is to the true interest of religion.

The public receipts diminished in some provinces in the beginning of the current fiscal year, but it is not anticipated that their total will fall below the previous estimate. Notwithstanding the increased expense through the recent improvements authorized and the renewal of part of the material of the army and navy, it is calculated that this fiscal year and the preceding one will show surplus revenue.

Agriculture, our principal and bountiful industry, demands from your intelligence provisions that will promptly remove the greater obstacles with which it is struggling. The deficiency of loan establishments is felt, to afford the planters, on conditions not onerous, the money they require for the perfecting and developing of their labors. The new contract with the Bank of Brazil is becoming beneficial, but all the provinces are not included in the bank's circumscription, nor are its means sufficient for all.

Last year you adopted various important resolutions. I feel assured you will continue in that course, and will consider, in the present session, other projects which your solicitude for the public good will recommend to your preference.

Popular education and instruction continue an object of the government's most assiduous cares, and a plan will be presented to you, the tendency of which will be to give a systematic and more vigorous impulse to that essential progress, to which private initiative, also, is rendering a most praiseworthy co-operation.

Electoral reform urges, and I trust you will carry it into effect this year, thereby attending to the high interests involved in the regular action of our political liberty.

The organization of the military force, and, likewise, the guarantees of individual liberty, appeal imperatively for a law to regulate impressment in a just and efficacious manner, and to remove thereby the insufficiency and abuses of the present system.

August and most worthy representatives of the nation: Every day strengthens our faith in the brilliant future of our country. Its realization will be the best recompense of our unceasing efforts.

The session is open.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your No. 116, in relation to the refunding by the Government of the United States to that of Brazil of the money paid by the latter in the case of the Caroline to Mr. Webb, with the inclosed copies of notes and of the receipt by the Brazilian chargé d'affaires, and the correspondence (printed) submitted by the President, May 26, 1874.

These have been duly noted and filed in this legation.

In a conversation some time ago at the foreign office, the minister expressed to me his sense of the high and honorable conduct of this matter by the Government of the United States, and some of the foreign representatives here have spoken to me in the same sense.

SIR: On the 18th instant notification was given and published by the minister of foreign affairs, addressed to the minister of justice, that on the 20th of this month the consular conventions which had heretofore been in force, (having been prolonged from year to year by consent since 1871,) between Brazil and France, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, and Portugal, in virtue of which the settlement of estates of subjects of those countries dying intestate here had been made by the consuls of those countries respectively, had ceased to exist, and that, in consequence, all such rights as were thereby secured would hereafter be determined by the law of the 8th of November, 1851, (decree No. 855.)

Of this decree regulating the interference of consuls in such matters, in cases where a reciprocity was granted in their respective countries to Brazilian consuls, I have already given account to the Department in my No. 97, there stating, also, that as the matter now stands between the United States and Brazil, our consuls may still intervene, under the previous law of 1845, in the nomination of curators, &c., and to compel an account before the regular tribunals.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 26, 1874.

SIR: You may be aware that the repayment to Brazil of the amount paid to the minister of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, on the 30th of September, 1867, by three drafts on London maturing January 1, 1868, as indemnity in the matter of the brig Caroline, has been often made the subject of conversation between the representative of the Emperor at Washington and the Secretary of State.

I have now the honor to inform you that the President, after a careful examination of the case, has come to the conclusion that the government of Brazil is not justly responsible for the damages in this case.

It is understood that the government of His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil is of the same opinion respecting it. Under these circumstances the President regards it as the duty of the United States to repay to Brazil the amount thus received by their minister at Rio, with interest thereon at six per cent. per annum, the rate established in the proceedings between the two governments respecting the "Canada."

I have therefore the honor to inform you that I shall be prepared on the 1st of July next, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at this Department, on receiving from you an official receipt in full, to pay to you, on behalf of your government, the sum of ninety-six thousand four hundred and six dollars and seventy-three cents, being the amount of the payment above referred to, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

The amount of the original payments was fourteen thousand two hundred and fifty-two pounds sterling.

The three drafts in which the payment was made matured on the 1st January, 1868.

The time, therefore, for which interest is calculated is six years and six months.

The value of the pound sterling in the coin of the United States is fixed by law at four $\frac{8665}{10000}$ dollars.

Washington, June 29, 1874. (Received July 1.)

SIR: I have to-day had the honor to receive the note addressed to me by your excellency on the 26th instant, whereby you informed me that the President of the United States, after a careful examination of the claim raised by the sale of the Peruvian brig Caroline, had reached the conclusion that, as was thought by the government of His Majesty, my august sovereign, the imperial government was not lawfully responsible for the damages arising from the case, and that the Government of the United States had therefore determined to refund to the imperial government the amount paid by it, on the 30th day of September, 1867, to General J. W. Webb, at that time minister of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, for the settlement of that claim.

By the note to which I now have the honor to reply, your excellency requested me to call at the Department of State, on the first proximo, at eleven o'clock in the morning, for the purpose of receiving the sum of ninety-six thousand four hundred and six dollars, being the amount of the said payment, with interest at six per cent. per annum, which rate was agreed upon between the two governments in the case of the Canada.

Mr. A. P. de Carvalho Borges, the head of this legation, being absent on leave, has transferred to me the authorization which he received from the imperial government to receive this sum, in case of its being refunded, and I shall therefore not fail to call at the Department of State on the day appointed by your excellency for that purpose. After having given a receipt for the sum in question, I shall remit it immediately, together with your excellency's note, to the imperial government, which will be highly gratified by the just and honorable settlement made by the Government of the United States of the case of the Caroline.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of the correspondence between the minister of foreign affairs and myself, in regard to the celebration to-morrow of the fifty-second anniversary of the independence of Central America. It is my purpose to avail myself of the opportunity to discuss our proposed centennial celebration, and also to touch upon, as adroitly as I can, the advantages that would result to Central America from a union of all the states under one government. I have discussed this latter subject in an unofficial way many times, both in Costa Rica and here. The universally professed sentiment is in favor of the union, except among the office-holders. They speak of it as desirable, but impracticable owing to local jealousies, differences of indebtedness, difficulties of intercommunication, &c. As the office-holders control the people, it is not probable at present that any action will be taken by the governments looking to union. In my opinion, from information received up to this time, there may be a probability of effecting a union between Guatemala, Salvador, and Honduras, if their present governments continue in power for a few years; but I think Costa Rica prefers isolation or a union with Colombia. * * * *

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that there is but little doubt now that the attempted revolutionary movement of Palacios and his associates against Guatemala, Honduras, and San Salvador has been a signal failure; as all the operations are conducted upon the Caribbean side, and it is impossible to get reliable information here, it may be rather hazardous to say "there is but little doubt." I hope the consul on that coast has kept you informed, as it has been impossible for me to have done more than to waste ink and paper in the transmission of flying rumors current to-day and contradicted to-morrow. It is highly probable General Palacios was largely assisted with advice, information, and funds by those who are now in Nicaragua. I am also apprehensive he might have received assurances of aid from the present government of Costa Rica in the event of his success appearing probable. It has also been stated, but I hope without any foundation whatever, that he was assisted by the owners of the General Sherman, the Messrs. Keith, who are the contractors for the construction of the Costa Rica Railroad. His failure has resulted from several causes, the first of which is his lack of military knowledge and prestige. Second, the slowness of his movements and their advertisement in advance. Third, there is no such thing as a revolution by the people in Central America. Fourth, the party upon which he relied to help him, in Guatemala particularly, had been so intimidated by the severe measures of President Barrios, that they could not find courage to organize. I mean by this party, the majority of the old and wealthy families and the more respectable of the clergy.

The government of this republic presents an anomaly in its administration. The constitution having been abolished before a new one was made, and the constitutional Congress having adjourned before completing its work, Guatemala finds herself to-day without either a written constitution or one such as England. Her chief magistrate, President Barrios, was elected, I am informed, by an insignificant vote. * * * * I am told by what ought to be good authority that at the election of last spring the number of votes cast for President was about 900, and that President Barrios received 600 of that number. And yet his government seems strong—so strong that he does not appear to fear revolutions—and has actually decreed that the church property and proceeds, together with what I understand to be property of charitable institutions, shall be taken out of the hands of the present administrators and placed under the management of certain-named gentlemen for the purpose of creating a bank. Although I have been using every reasonable exertion to ascertain whether he has a strong hold upon the affections or respect of the laboring classes, I cannot learn that he is very popular with them.

* * * * I think his strength lies where that of any popular leader of this country lies, in the army and officials. His reputation as a successful guerrilla chief, and subsequently as a general, is good, and, judging from observation and from what I learn of reforms he has introduced into the army, I think he is devoting much of his time to that branch of the service, and leaving civil affairs to his ministers.

These officials are, as a general rule, men of ability, and the chief of the cabinet, Mr. Samayoa, enjoys the reputation of being a man of fine education and rare talent. He is, I know, agreeable and intelligent. The general apathy of the people in regard to public affairs, together with the stern measures of repression adopted by President Barrios, incline me, with my present information, to the opinion that he is not likely to be overthrown by a revolution that will occur in a year or so. * * * I must add that I have not yet heard a foreigner express any other opinion of President Barrios's administration except that he understands how to govern his people, and that there will be peace and quiet as long as he is President.

No. 29.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, September 28, 1873. (Received November 4.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the opportunity of quite a long and free conversation has been afforded me with President Barrios, his chief minister, Mr. Samayoa, and the minister of foreign affairs. It occurred at the house of the President. Our first subject of discussion was civil marriage. Certain Swiss citizens had applied to me to marry them, under the impression they had the same rights that American citizens have. I informed them that according to my construction of the Circular No. 15, and of international law, the citizens of Switzerland in Guatemala, by reason of the act of their government in asking the protection of our minister here to be extended to them, and the consent of the government of Guatemala that such protection should be extended, were in nowise changed in their relations to their own government or to mine; that the only object sought to be accomplished, or that could be accomplished, by the asking and granting said protection was that the good offices of my government should be interposed in behalf of the citizens of Switzerland whenever this could be legitimately done without injury to my own Government; that the right of American citizens to be married at the legation, or rather the right of the minister to celebrate the marriage of such citizens of his country in Guatemala, was derived exclusively from that extraterritorial jurisdiction granted by international comity and sentiment by consent and law. Hence I declined to celebrate the marriage as requested, but promised myself to present the matter to the government of Guatemala in an unofficial way, if the Swiss gentleman could afford me the opportunity of doing so without impropriety, by addressing a letter to the proper authority requesting that a decree be issued authorizing him to be married by any civil magistrate of Guatemala. The Swiss did so, and in the interview with the President and members of his cabinet, which I am attempting to describe, the subject of civil marriages was presented and discussed. I took the liberty of saying: In my country we were opposed to all special legislation, and therefore upon principle I could not advocate the issuance of a decree for the benefit of the Swiss citizens whose case had given rise to the discussion, but that in our opinion, which was sustained by the legislatures of the most civilized countries of Europe, and by the advanced ideas lately promulgated in laws by the neighboring state of Mexico, marriage was a civil contract, and should be permitted to be entered into by strangers in Guatemala as any other contracts, by the consent and act of the civil authorities, whether the clergy were disposed or not to assist; it was a sacrament and without effect unless they secured their fees by pronouncing the benediction.

President Barrios expressed his hearty concurrence in these views, and said he would issue the decree to morrow authorizing civil marriages between foreigners residing in Guatemala. He said he hardly thought the time had arrived for him to extend this privilege of civil marriage to his own people. I replied, it would in all probability soon come; * * * * that in our country we considered the civil law supreme, and would neither furnish a hierarchy of Romanists or Protestants to assert that its sanction was necessary to give validity to a contract which the law pronounced good. * * * * I then said there were three rivers in Guatemala which I thought my government, with the permission of Guatemala, would be glad to have explored, if the Government of Mexico would give its joint consent to the exploration of one of them, the Usumacinta, which empties itself through Mexican territory into the Bay of Campeachy. The rivers alluded to, running entirely through Guatemala soil, are the Motagun and Potochic, both flowing eastward and emptying into the Gulf of Dolce and Bay of Honduras. Both are reputed to be navigable for a considerable distance, and the former is said to be navigable at all seasons for vessels drawing six feet up to a point within fourteen leagues, or forty-two miles, of this city. The President and ministers said the government would be glad to grant the permission, if asked. I remarked that we should also, probably, wish to sound, explore, and map such portions of the coast of Guatemala as were adjacent to the Gulf and Bay of Dolce. They said there would be no objection, and would be gratified if the United States would undertake the work. I replied, I would communicate with you on the subject before opening my correspondence with them in regard to it. The three rivers named, the Usumacinta, Potochic, Motagun, if navigable, as reputed, are very valuable as commercial outlets of the trade and products of Guatemala and the provinces of Tabasco and Chiapas to the ports of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea nearest our cities on the Gulf coast. I recommend to your consideration, therefore, whether it would not be advisable to address the Secretary of the Navy upon the subject of the explorations mentioned, after taking the views and instructions of the President thereon.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you herewith a decree of President Barrios authorizing civil marriages in Guatemala among foreigners residing here. It is a step in the direction of liberalism which I hope will soon be followed by one which will place the right of civil marriage within the reach of the citizens of Guatemala who are disposed to avail themselves of it. At present Roman Catholic supremacy feels able to assert its power to such a degree that notwithstanding the decree was issued and the church party stands in awe of the rude but prompt measures of President Barrios, the Swiss gentleman, Mr. Grubber, reported to me he was unable to find a civil magistrate in this city who would consent to solemnize his marriage. I advised him strongly to leave no exertions untried to have his marriage contract entered into before a civil magistrate, and tried myself to get an officer to perform the act. Not one objected on religious grounds, but all feigned or presented excuses of one kind and another, thus conveying to my mind the impression they feared the responsibility. Up to this point my mind was decided not to celebrate the act of marriage in person, but being urged by the Swiss citizen, I consulted with President Barrios, his chief minister, Mr. Samaoya, his minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Soto, and also with a prominent lawyer, Mr. Ramirez, ex-minister of foreign affairs, and, after having taken the friendly consultation of the minister of Her Britannic Majesty, Mr. Edwin Corbett, I consented to celebrate the marriage at the legation. Such an event was too important both in its relations to the parties and to our government to be entered upon unadvisedly, and, although my own opinion was adverse to the validity of the act of marriage, I consented to yield to the opinions expressed, and to perform the ceremony at the legation to-night in the presence of the distinguished persons named. The Duke d'Langrand, chargé d'affaires of Italy, and Mr. Cabarrus, chargé d'affaires of France, promise to be present with their families, although they are Roman Catholics. They also promise to sign the act of marriage as witnesses, and under their authority I have prepared a proces verbal which has their names inserted as acting in that capacity.

The President, Barrios, his chief minister, Samaoya, his minister of foreign affairs, Soto, all say they will be glad to lend their presence to such a ceremonial.

Decree.

The President of the republic has thought fit to issue the following decree, No. 105 :
 J. Rufino Barrios, President of the republic of Guatemala, considering that the liberty of religious worship having been decreed, as a natural consequence of such decree marriage contracted between persons professing a different religion from that which predominates in this country will be recognized as valid. That such recognition, founded in the principle of toleration adopted lately in the republic, tends to remove one of the principal obstacles which the existing legislation offers to foreign immigration.

Decree.

Article 1st. Marriage contracted between foreigners residing in the republic in accordance with the laws of their respective nationalities, are valid, even when in such celebrations the forms and requisites which are in force in Guatemala are not observed.

Article 2d. Such marriages shall be productive of the same civil effects as the law recognizes to the natives of the country who marry in accordance with its laws.

Article 3d. For the purpose of establishing and registering such acts, and while the law upon civil registry is being prepared, the contracting parties will present to the ministers of the government within the termination of one month, counting from the date of the marriage, an authentic certificate of its celebration; with these documents a book will be formed, which will be in charge of the clerk of the high court of justice, from which can be taken the required certificates.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith the correspondence between the secretary of foreign affairs and myself in regard to the report of the consul at Guatemala about the actions of the General Sherman, and the bombardment of Omoa by the British man-of-war Niobe. It is proper for me to mention that the report is but a written declaration of the verbal statement made to me by the said consul at the President's house, at the invitation of the President and in the presence of the chief members of his cabinet. At my suggestion it was reduced to writing. The British minister, Mr. Edwin Corbett, also did me the honor to read to me the report made to him by a Mr. Bain, who was acting as vice-consul of Her Britannic Majesty at Omoa at the time of the occurrences referred to. The two statements correspond as to the conduct of the "Sherman," and do not, in my judgment, vary materially as to the bombardment, except that in the British statement very great prominence is given to the sacking of Omoa, and insult to the British flag, and trespass upon the (so-called) British soil of the island of Zapodilla, when the authorities of Honduras (General Straeber commanding) captured the Spanish and Portuguese consuls there.

In the absence of any report from our own consul at Omoa, Mr. Chas. R. Follin, I have had to rely upon their statements in order to make up an opinion on the subject. I wrote to Mr. Follin, but presuming he lived at one or the other of the ports to which he is nominated as consul, I addressed my letter wrong. It seems he does not reside at Omoa or Truxillo, but a little village opposite the village of Puerto Cadballo. Hoping that it may not be considered improper, but on the contrary perfectly proper, that I should give you my opinion, I beg leave to say that I am compelled to believe the captain of the Sherman has unjustifiably and outrageously abused the flag of our country, and also that General Straeber's conduct in the sacking of Omoa and pillaging (or allowing to be pillaged) the British consulate was disgraceful, to say nothing of his barbarity in firing upon a party from the General Sherman, which, under a flag of truce, approached the fortress of Omoa to accept its delivery according to previous arrangement with the treacherous fellow who was in command. This fellow's name I have been unable to learn. Whether the said party was composed of filibusters or not does not alter the barbarity of slaughtering in cold blood human beings who had a right to believe they were protected by a white flag, and who, relying upon the sanctity given by such protection among civilized nations, placed themselves at the mercy of their slayers. I also venture to recommend that the General Sherman be seized. Is she not a pirate? If the reports about her repeated changes of flag be true, and she is an armed vessel of a private person, General Palacios or any of his confederates, and is being used for hostile purposes against peaceful states, would she not be rightfully classed among those piratical vessels in the possession of a crew and acknowledging obedience to no flag whatever, but, in defiance of all law, levying war for purposes of private gain? It occurs to me she could not complain of such a classification, if the statements made in regard to her are true. I venture to throw out the suggestion.

I have, &c.,

Señor Soto to Mr. Williamson.

GUATEMALA, October 4, 1873.

SEÑOR: I have the honor to inclose to you the certified report of Señor Don Delfino Sanchez, our consul at the establishment of Belize. From this document you will be able to inform yourself concerning the principal facts of Pallacio's expedition, and especially the facts concerning the abuse of the American flag and of the strange behavior of the American vice-consul. I hope that you will transmit the report to your Government, and in the meanwhile, with your known disposition for justice, you will take whatever steps in your power to put a stop to the evils occasioned to the governments of Guatemala and Honduras by the expedition, which is assisted, directly or indirectly, by agents and citizens of the nation which you so worthily represent.

With the most distinguished consideration, I have the pleasure to subscribe myself your humble servant,

MARCO A. SOTO.

To his Excellency the Hon. GEO. WILLIAMSON, &c.

[Inclosure in 1 in No. 35.—Translation.]

Report of the consul of Guatemala at Belize.

Having been honored by the supreme government of the republic as consul to the establishment of Belize, I arrived at that place about the end of last July.

I immediately presented to the lieutenant-governor my credentials, and was recognized provisionally in the character of consular agent of Guatemala while the customary exequaturs should be received from England. I am happy to be able to state that my reception by the lieutenant-governor was truly frank and cordial, showing on his part a spirit of consideration and friendship for the republic of Guatemala which was confirmed afterward by acts conducive to the peace and general welfare of this republic which I will mention presently.

In compliance with one of the principal charges in the mission which I carried to Belize, I went to the lieutenant-governor's, soliciting the embargo of the armament which is in the house of Guild & Co. This armament, as the government knows, was brought from the United States for Vicente Cerna, to be employed in hostilities against this republic; but when he wished to carry them away from Belize they were not delivered, because our minister in England had interposed and obtained a retention. Afterward, when that retention had been countermanded by the same English government, there appeared in the Belize waters the steamer Gen. Sherman, with the American flag flying, claiming the arms for the purpose of carrying them off; the consul of Honduras, Señor Nutrie, affirming that Don Vicente Cerna sold these arms to the president of Costa Rica, Thomas Guardia, presenting in corroboration a letter from Señor Cordez, vice-consul of that republic in Colon. Notwithstanding, the governor would not permit the arms to be delivered, being certain that they would be used against this republic, as they surely would have been, as is proved by the warlike acts of the Gen. Sherman immediately after her departure from Belize. The house of Guild & Co., in view of the governor's negative, presented him a writing, with the view, perhaps, of bringing charges against him for these proceedings. The governor then, with the advice of his council, prohibited for the space of six weeks the exportation of all material of war in consideration of the state of invasion of the coast of Guatemala and Honduras, which disposition was legalized by reason of the continuance of the same causes which prompted the act. By that very just and loyal disposition the governor of Belize has given to these republics menaced by filibusters a proof very much to be appreciated of his good intention not to permit those who are disposed to war against us to have direct or indirect assistance from the establishment, which is now at peace with us and desirous of maintaining the best political and commercial relations. I can add with satisfaction that that proceeding, so favorable to the order and good of these republics, does not altogether ensue from the good spirit of English legislation, but principally from the honor and impartiality of the lieutenant-governor and his council, who, understanding perfectly the purposes why the arms were wanted, did not permit themselves to be surprised into delivering them on frivolous pretexts or menaces. In order to explain the foul measures adopted by the invaders, headed by Palacios, for recruiting men in Colon, I will give a few dates and facts obtained from the attorney-general of the Queen in Belize, which will elucidate the subject. At my request, he gave me the following: Some natives of Jamaica, and English subjects which were in Colon, were asked by Captain Gordon to be employed in the Sherman, telling them that the vessel was his by virtue of purchase, and carried the American flag. Twelve of them agreed to go for six weeks to the port of Limon and Belize, not suspecting that the voyage was of a hostile character. In Colon about forty embarked with them as passengers, among whom was one they called General Palacios.

From Colon they went to the port of Costa Rica, where they met a schooner which carried the flag of Costa Rica, from which was transferred to the Sherman a great number of boxes; some were long boxes, which contained Remington rifles. They then proceeded to the Key of Culabra, in the colony of Belize, where were disembarked the greater part of the passengers, the steamer proceeding to Belize, where she remained a few hours, while Captain Gordon went on shore and returned with some provisions. On returning to the key, several boats came to her from Belize, bringing the Englishmen Morgan and Garnier, the Americans Tracy and Clotter, and various others. Those who were left at the key were re-embarked. They then commenced to open the boxes which were taken from the schooner and to arm the passengers; they then proceeded, flying the American flag, to the islands of Utila and Ruitan, taking prisoner the governor of the latter, leaving in his place the Englishman Garnier, who obliged the inhabitants to take arms and embark on the Sherman for Truxillo, which place they took, always flying the flag of the United States. After they had disembarked, there took place a little firing, when Colonel Oriza was killed. Two days after the taking of Truxillo was celebrated the installation of the government of Honduras, which they called "legitimate constitutional," and they also changed the name of the steamer to "Col. Oriza," and hoisted the Honduras flag. From here they went to Zapotilla Key, where they took a sloop with a Colonel Lubin, six soldiers, and two Spanish subjects, keeping all in confinement except the Spaniards, who were free. They went to the port of Cortes and Omoa, having also made a trip to Livingston and Santo Tomas, where they took by force about thirty men. At the port of Cortes the witnesses to the above report demanded to be dismissed, as their time of contract had expired and they had no wish to belong to any filibustering expedition. These men testify that they went to the vice-consul of the United States, Mr. Brinton, to complain against Captain Gordon for the swindle which he had put upon them, and that this functionary refused to receive any information whatever upon the matter, and even advised them to desist from their intentions. That which proves the partiality of the United States vice-consul is his reply made to the lieutenant-governor's observations in regard to the Sherman and the arms, that there was nothing to fear, since the papers which she carried were all regular, when it is known to the undersigned that she had no papers whatever. Another event upon which I deem it necessary to enlighten the government is the bombardment of the castle of Omoa, which was done by the captain of the English ship Niobe. The captain of this vessel communicated to Gen eral Straeber the peremptory demand to deliver the sum of one hundred thousand dollars as a guarantee for the losses sustained by English subjects at Omoa when that place was sacked by his permission, the immediate surrender of the English subjects held as prisoners in the castle, and the salute of twenty-one guns to the English flag. General Straeber requested an interview, which was denied. He then sent Gen. Mariano Alveres to inform him that the demands were altogether unjust; that he had no money; that he was not responsible for the losses of the English citizens, but the government of Honduras; and that, inasmuch as he could not submit to such demands, he protested against the threat of bombardment. The captain of the ship then modified his demand to fifty thousand dollars, the delivery of the prisoners, and the salute to the flag, giving until two in the evening of that day, the 19th of August, to decide, when, unless satisfied, he would commence the bombardment. Not being able to give the satisfaction demanded, the bombardment commenced at a quarter after four, and continued until six; commencing next morning at four and continuing to half past five, when they ceased, on seeing the white flag on the fort. That entering on a new arrangement, the captain remained satisfied with the delivery of the prisoners and a document signed by General Straeber obligating the government of Honduras to pay all losses claimed, and dispensing with the salute of twenty-one guns. This salute was required by the captain of the Niobe in satisfaction for supposed outrages toward the English consulship in Omoa, which was in charge of Señor F. Debrot, he having abandoned Omoa some time before, even before any hostile demonstrations took place, and went to Belize, leaving in charge Mr. Baine, the director of the railroad of Honduras, who resides in Porto Cortes. It was not then possible to have outraged the consulship when the person who was in charge lived in another place. This Mr. Debrot knows very well, that he, more than any other, has assisted Palacios, and that he abandoned Omoa, fearing the consequences of a toast made in public in favor of J. M. Medina, ex-president of Honduras. General Alveres remained on board the Niobe, and says that he met the vice-consul, Mr. Baine, who he believes to be complicated in favor of Palacios, since it is a fact that the forces of the latter used the trains on the railroad to carry on the war, using one of the cars with a mitrailleuse during the battle at the Chemilicon, and after the defeat to carry off their wounded. He also provided the Sherman with engineers and coal belonging to the same road.

There is nothing more at present of any importance to report.

Your obedient servant, &c., &c., &c.,

DELFINO SANCHEZ.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, October 6, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed communication of the 4th instant, inclosing a copy of a report made to your excellency on the 2d instant by Don Delfino Sanchez, the consul of Guatemala at the establishment of Belize, in regard to the movements of the steamship General Sherman and the bombardment of the fortress of Omoa by the British man-of-war Niobe. This very interesting report will be promptly forwarded to my Government, and I do not hesitate to assure you that I shall recommend the adoption of such a course toward the General Sherman as will be likely to prevent her, or similar crafts, from engaging in revolutionary expeditions against any of our neighbors of Central America.

I shall also call the attention of my Government specially to the statement of the consul in regard to bombardment of Omoa; but, at the same time, it will be my agreeable duty to communicate the facts upon which the commander of the Niobe (as I understand) rests his justification for bombarding the fort of a friendly power without having first afforded the government an opportunity to make redress for the wrongs complained of. It is probable the government of your ally and our friend, Honduras, will put me in possession of the statement or report of its commanding officer at Omoa, General Straeber.

Before concluding this communication, I beg to thank your excellency for the copy of the report of your consul, and to renew assurances, heretofore given, that my Government takes the most lively interest in all matters that concern the peace and prosperity of Guatemala and the other states of Central America, and cordially sympathizes with their governments in their efforts to suppress factious disturbances of public order.

I have the honor to assure your excellency of my distinguished consideration, and to subscribe myself your obedient servant,

GEO. WILLIAMSON.

No. 36.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, October 6, 1873. (Received November 4.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a certified copy of the proces-verbal of the act of marriage solemnized by me at this legation, on the evening of the 4th instant, between the parties and in the presence of the witnesses therein named.

In my dispatch No. 34 I have entered so fully into this subject, and the proces-verbal so fully discloses the reasons upon which I acted, together with the names of the distinguished witnesses present, that it seems to be unnecessary to say more at present. Whether the marriage is valid or not, I can declare that I have not allowed myself to be made the instrument of caprice, unless I have been grossly deceived by the legal opinion of a distinguished lawyer of this republic. The ceremony, which took place at the legation, was attended by the President, his premier or chief minister, Mr. Samayoa, and minister of foreign affairs, as well as by the British minister and French and Italian chargés d'affaires and other persons named in the certificate or proces-verbal. I have returned a copy to this government, handed an original to the bride, handed a copy to the bridegroom to be sent to his government, send you one herewith, and have filed one in the legation.

This important event of a civil marriage in Guatemala at this legation will, I trust, prove a happy one to the bridal pair as well as the beginning of more liberal legislation upon the subject of marriage than has heretofore been existing in this country.

I have, &c.,

GEO. WILLIAMSON.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, October 4, 1873.

To all to whom these presents may come, greeting:

Be it known that, by virtue of a license granted by his native country, Switzerland, to Guido Gruebler, esq., to have the act of marriage between himself and Miss Elvira del Carmen Sauvat celebrated before a consul of the United States, or by a minister resident or plenipotentiary of the United States of America in Guatemala, and by reason of the fact that the citizens of Switzerland in Guatemala are under the protection of the American legation, and also by reason of the fact that decree No. 105 of the government of Guatemala is construed by the highest officials of the republic to authorize said marriage to be performed by me, and, further, by reason of the fact that the parties referred to in said act of marriage, after having been fully informed by me of all objection that might be made to the validity of this said act, still insist that it should be so celebrated, and furnish me with the opinion of an eminent lawyer of Guatemala, Don Manuel Ramirez, ex-minister of foreign affairs, that said act of marriage would be legal, I proceeded, in the presence of Señor Don J. Rufino Barrios, President of the republic of Guatemala, and in the presence of Don José Maria Samayoa, minister of war and of the department of improvement, and Señor Lic'do Don Marco A. Soto, minister of foreign affairs, and of Mr. Edwin Corbett, minister resident of Her Britannic Majesty, and of Mr. J. Tallien de Cabarrus, chargé d'affaires of France, and of the Duke de Licignano, chargé d'affaires of Italy, and of Mr. Frederick C. Augener, consul of the German Empire, and of Henry Houben, esq., consul of the United States of America, and of Mr. John Morrell, a citizen of the United States, and other persons then present, those specially named herein subscribing their names hereto with me and the said Guido Gruebler, esq., and said Miss Elvira del Carmen Sauvat, to celebrate the act of marriage between said Guido Gruebler, aged 31 years, born the 20th of November, 1842, in St. Gallien Canton, in Switzerland, and said Miss Elvira del Carmen Sauvat, aged 22 years, born in the city of Santiago, Chili, in the month of August, 24th, 1851, both now residing in the city of Guatemala, in accordance with the forms and rites of the Episcopal Church of the United States, at the legation of the United States in the city of Guatemala, and republic of Guatemala, on the 4th day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, and Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto affixed my signature and seal to three (3) certificates.

No. 37.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
STEAMSHIP HONDURAS, OFF ACAJUTLA,
San Salvador, October 12, 1873. (Received November 4.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the day before I left Guatemala, (October 9, 1873,) it was officially communicated to me by Mr. Samayoa, prime minister of President Barrios, that news had just been received that Palacios was still at Puerto Cabello and had about five hundred men; that he had furnished a military chief called Barrona (who had some reputation as a sort of barbarous guerrilla) with arms and about fifty men; that this man had marched to a point within a few leagues of Comayagua, and having gathered on the way about four hundred additional men, gave battle to the troops of Honduras and defeated them. He was not strong enough to pursue his advantage, but was threatening Comayagua, where President Arias was with about four hundred men, who had no military commander of any experience. He also stated that he believed Arias would be overthrown unless the troops of Guatemala and San Salvador arrived in time to save him. He said Guatemala had dispatched into Honduras five hundred men in addition to the seven hundred she already had there, and that San Salvador had sent one thousand. He also expressed the opinion that Medina, the ex-President of Honduras, who has been for a long time held as a prisoner at Comayagua, had been shot. All these statements were corroborated by information conveyed to me on the same day, in unofficial conversations, by the British minister and the French and Italian chargés d'affaires. These gentlemen also expressed an opinion, which I had also formed, that the main object of Guatemala and San Salvador in sending troops into Honduras was to suppress the revolution inaugurated by Palacios, but that when that point was gained the two governments would unite to compel President Arias to resign, so as to give way for a man of respectable talents and character, called Ponciano Leiva. This person was at one time minister of foreign affairs under Medina, in which position he acquitted himself very well. The complaint of the governments of Guatemala and San Salvador against President Arias is, that he is unpopular and inefficient. I know nothing of the justice of this complaint, but my information is that he is a lawyer of fair reputation and has neither military skill nor tastes.

I postponed writing from Guatemala so as to be able to gain further information at this port. Here I am told President Medina has escaped and joined the troops of San Salvador, and that San Salvador has sent two thousand instead of one thousand troops into Honduras, and, moreover, that it is reported the forces of Palacios are scattered in the mountains around Comayagua.

* * * * *

You are too familiar with the difficulties of obtaining reliable information here to feel any astonishment if all the facts and inferences above set forth should prove incorrect.

I expect to arrive at San Salvador to-morrow.

No. 42.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
San Salvador, October 18, 1873. (Received Nov. 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, in accordance with the appointment, communicated to you, to-day at 12 o'clock I was admitted to a public audience by the President of this republic, and delivered to him my letter of credence, accompanied with an address, a copy of which is inclosed. I also inclose you a copy of his reply, and beg to call your attention to the importance he professes to attach to my quotation from your report to the Senate, dated July 14, 1870. I believe the words made a highly satisfactory impression on him, as in our subsequent conversation he alluded to them as the first authoritative expressions of that kind he had ever heard of the policy of my Government to the Central American States.

The reception was very handsome and very cordial. In fact, although I have given more of the special details of my receptions at Costa Rica and Guatemala, for fear of its being thought I was weak enough to attribute to my own personal qualities too large a share of the honors extended, it seems due to the Department that I should mention as a fact of political significance that my receptions by the President and officials, native and foreign citizens of the states I have visited up to this time, have been attended with a hearty cordiality, indicative of the constantly increasing influence and authority of our country abroad, and particularly in these states.

The President invited me to a banquet to-morrow at 11 a. m., which is to be attended by the officials, and by the deputies of the Congress, which has just adjourned. I accepted the invitation.

President Gonzalez impresses me favorably. He has a good face and a frank manner. He talks well and expresses the most profound admiration for our Government and people. Like Barrios and Guardia, of Guatemala and Costa Rica, he belongs to the liberal party, is in favor of immigration and of cultivating the arts and sciences, and of the most rapid development of the country that a prudent regard for its resources will allow. He expressed great regret that he could not offer me a house in San Salvador. As I am staying in one of his houses now, I took occasion to thank him for the hospitality already extended and to say that I hoped to be frequently in San Salvador during my official term.

Address of Mr. Williamson to President Gonzalez of Salvador.

MR. PRESIDENT: The President of the United States, having conferred upon me the high honor of accrediting me as minister resident to Central America, has made me the bearer of a letter of credence to your excellency, which I now have the honor to deliver. It may be almost idle for me to add to the words contained in the letter my assurances of the good will of my Government and countrymen for the people of San Salvador. They have had the continual sympathy of the people of the United States in the steady advance of their political and material progress since 1821. Neither my Government nor my countrymen can forget how much gallant blood San Salvador has shed since 1823 until now to defend her liberties against the insidious designs of infatuated partisans, who seemed to believe they were created to call themselves to office rather than be called by the popular voice. San Salvador has played so conspicuous a part in Central American politics that I hope I may be excused for quoting words to you, Mr. President, which the Secretary of State of the United States used in a report to the Senate in regard to all the Central American states. They contain an eloquent epitome of the sentiments of my Government. He said: "A favorable time has now come for removing them, [that is, obstacles to commerce,] for laying the foundation for an American policy which shall bind in closer union the American republics. Let them understand that the United States do not covet their territories; that our only desire is to see them peaceful, with free and stable governments, increasing in wealth and population, and developing in the lines in which their own traditions, customs, habits, laws, and modes of thought will naturally take them. Let them feel that, as in 1826, so now, this Government is ready to aid them to the full extent of its constitutional power in any steps which they may take for their better protection against anarchy." In a different form, these words are but reiterations of the wish expressed in my letter of credence and conveyed in my assurance that I shall do all in my power to make more cordial the friendly relations that have so long subsisted between San Salvador and my country. Whatever I can personally or officially do to contribute to the mutual advantage and honor of our respective countries shall be most cheerfully done. And I now avail myself of this occasion to say to you and your cabinet, Mr. President, that it shall be the most pleasant part of my duty to make our relations agreeable and to work with you to make more intimate the political and commercial bonds and sympathies that naturally exist between this republic and the United States.

Reply of President Gonzalez to Mr. Williamson.

MR. MINISTER: It gives me great pleasure to receive from your hands the autographic letter of His Excellency the President of the United States, who accredits you as minister resident from that nation near this republic. The loyalty and honesty which characterize you, and in that the worthy Chief Magistrate of your Government has honored you with his confidence, secures the maintenance of the cordial sympathies and friendship which happily have and still exist between the people and governments of America and Salvador. The memorable words of your Secretary of State, which you have just quoted, are significant and important in the relations of both republics. The facts and ideas set forth in them clearly prove that Salvador in her divers struggles against the enemies of her progress, and in her constant efforts to destroy the reactionary elements which have for so long infested her bosom, has placed a well-grounded confidence in the example of the pure republicans of the United States, who have so nobly merited this faith, as they have strived only for the cause of order, holding themselves aloof from projects purely personal, (as you have said,) and from principles that are peculiar to those antiquated and retrogressive systems that destroy the sanctity of rights and debase the dignity of humanity. The American Union and Salvador through the same means tend to the same end, the advancement and happiness of mankind, by the elevation of his dignity and the full exercise of his liberties; that is, by the consolidation of order by means of a rational and judicious enforcement of authority. The sympathies and friendship that have such a foundation are indissoluble, and to cultivate and strengthen them has been and still is for my government an agreeable duty. In the name of the people of Salvador, I tender my thanks to the people of the United States for the benevolent sentiments which in their name you have just expressed. Personally and officially, you will meet in my government the most friendly disposition and the most lively desire to draw closer the political and commercial relations between the two peoples. I congratulate myself that the representation of the United States in these countries has been intrusted to a person of your merit, since the many worthy qualities which adorn you afford other guarantees of the good-will, harmony, and affability which should govern our relations.

No. 43.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
San Salvador, October 20, 1873. (Received Nov. 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the banquet yesterday was attended by a number of the representative men of this republic in addition to the President and his cabinet, and the toasts proposed and speeches made afforded me a good opportunity of witnessing the drift of the current public opinion. The first toast was offered by the minister of foreign affairs, as he said by direction of the President, to the United States, President Grant, and the United States minister present. It was accompanied by a handsome speech, in which the minister spoke of the ratification by the Congress of Salvador of the quadruplicate treaty, offensive and defensive, between the states of Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua, as a sure pledge of pacification and of security against the disturbances created by reactionary factionists. He said it was a step in the direction of the happy and glorious union that existed in the United States, and for which Salvador had always been ready to make any sacrifices. I replied, and although I spoke in English, what I said seemed to be sufficiently understood to elicit applause and to be highly satisfactory to the President, whose health I proposed, with some complimentary remarks. Quite a number of speeches were then made, the tendency of all of which appeared to put boldly forward the idea of the unification of the five Central American States. Thinking the occasion appropriate, and after inquiring of the President and others whether it could be done without offense, I proposed, after some remarks upon his life, public services, devotion to the federal principle, and unhappy execution by a misguided people on the anniversary of Central American independence, the memory of the great leader of liberalism and federalism in Central America, Morazan. It was received with an enthusiasm that was a gratifying indication that the sentiments of the popular representatives were favorable to those ideas of Central American policy which under your instructions it is my duty to encourage. All the speeches contained very handsome compliments to our country, and I believe (not from these alone) that the United States are held in profound and affectionate reverence by the leading minds of Salvador.

To-day I called upon the President and minister of foreign affairs to bid them good-by, as I leave for Nicaragua to-morrow. They were both together at the President's house. He told me the military operations of Salvador and Guatemala had been eminently successful in Honduras, with little loss of life on either side. He said his troops had defeated Barraona at La Paz, a town near but on this side of Comayagua, and had pursued them to the mountains north of Comayagua; that the factionists were few in number and completely demoralized, and he hoped General Solares, commanding the forces of Guatemala at San Pedro, would so move his troops as to prevent the factionists from reaching the seaboard near the mouth of the Uloa, off which the General Sherman was lying. He showed me a field-map of the theater of operations, and in my opinion if General Solares does not capture or disperse the defeated bands of Barraona and Palacios, it will be because he is deficient in military skill and promptitude, or because he is not well informed. I think that it is highly probable before this General Palacios and his party have found prayers * * * less efficacious than they had been persuaded to believe. The attempted revolution was not an unmitigated evil. It has resulted so far in consolidating the power of the presiding officers of Salvador and Guatemala in producing the ratification of the treaty between the four states, and will result in giving, I hope, to Honduras a constitutional President, who will be acceptable to the people, and, by his prestige as a military man, be enabled to suppress factious opposition. Various candidates' names are mentioned, but my latest information is that probably General Lopez will be proclaimed and subsequently elected. Leiva, whom I mentioned in a previous dispatch, is said to have compromised himself or been compromised by his friends recently, in connection with the movement of Palacios. The President also spoke in animated terms of the bombardment of Omoa by the British ship Niobe.

To-morrow I expect to leave for Nicaragua.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Nicaragua, November 2, 1873. (Received Dec. 2.)

SIR: Inclosed I have the honor to transmit you a translated copy of the treaty of August 26, 1873, recently ratified by the governments of Guatemala, Salvador, and Nicaragua, and which, without doubt, will also be ratified by the new government that is proposed to be organized in Honduras.

I beg to call your attention to the fifth article, and to remark that I believe in the four states named there is a strong and growing disposition to adopt the principle of confederation. Costa Rica stands aloof now, because her people, in my opinion, are opposed to confederation with the other states.

[Inclosure.—Translation.]

Treaty concluded between the republics of Guatemala, Salvador, and Nicaragua, by General Don Buenaventura Carazo and Don Anselmo H. Rivas, in the city of Managua, on the 26th of August, 1873.

ARTICLE 1. The republics of Salvador, Guatemala, and Nicaragua pledge themselves in the most solemn manner to labor with all zeal for the consolidation of liberal principles in each one of them, lending for this purpose, mutually, all their moral support.

ART. 2. The high contracting parties, being convinced that the present administration of Costa Rica is hostile to the peace of the Central American States, pledge themselves to maintain a defensive alliance against that government. In consequence, should any of these states be invaded by forces of the government of Costa Rica, or by expeditions of any kind proceeding from that state, the other states will lend aid of all kinds that may be asked, unless they find themselves in the same condition.

ART. 3. The high contracting parties will agree among themselves in regard to the number of men which each of them must furnish to guard the frontier of Costa Rica. The auxiliary forces will be under the orders of the state, receiving aid as soon as they enter the territory of such state.

ART. 4. If all the resources shall be exhausted which are recognized by international law as indispensable to prevent disruption, and if the majority of the high contracting parties shall consider the guarantee offered by the defensive attitude mentioned in the above articles to be insufficient, an offensive alliance shall be formed, the details of which shall be settled by a separate convention.

ART. 5. The governments mentioned agree that, when the circumstances which cause this alliance shall no longer exist, they will earnestly labor for the formation of a common government for the republics of Central America, and in case they shall meet with any serious unexpected difficulties, they will take active steps to secure uniform legislation, weights, measures, and foreign representation, and will do all in their power to strengthen the bonds which unite the people of Central America.

ART. 6. The high contracting parties solemnly pledge themselves from this time forth to develop, in separate conventions, the principles laid down in the above article, in order that the bonds of fraternity which now unite them may be strengthened.

ART. 7. The republics of Salvador and Guatemala agree that, so soon as the present situation of Costa Rica shall be changed, they will take the initiative, in order that the boundary question pending between Nicaragua and that republic may be arranged in a friendly manner and in accordance with the interests of both parties, and if this cannot be done, that it shall be decided by arbitration, as stipulated between the two countries, in as short a time as possible, to the end that a stop may be put to the hostile feelings which it originates between them.

ART. 8. The high contracting parties pledge themselves to solicit the adhesion of the government of Honduras to the present treaty; also to propose its adoption to the republic of Costa Rica whenever the circumstances of her government may appear favorable and promise to be permanent.

ART. 9. The present treaty shall be ratified in due form and its ratifications exchanged at this capital within seventy days, reckoning from its date, or earlier if possible.

Having faith that each one of the high contracting parties will religiously comply with all of the above stipulations, the plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the present treaty at Managua, on the 26th day of the month of August, in the year 1873.

No. 52.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Amapala, Honduras, Nov. 5, 1873. (Received Dec. 2.)

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a translated copy of a circular just received from the government of Costa Rica. For the present I shall dismiss it by inviting you to its careful perusal. * *

* * * I beg, however, to assure you I feel myself too secure in my disposition in favor of impartial justice, as well as in my determination to permit no sentiment or idea of partisanship to influence me in the discharge of my duty, to allow this circular to elicit from me such a reply as would either compromise the Government with Costa Rica or the other four states. After having carefully canvassed the circular as well as all the facts in connection with the whole subject of the alliance, I hope to be able to write such a letter as will meet your approval.

I learn here that it is very dangerous now to travel through Honduras, and that the president, Arias, is just about to abdicate in favor of Leiva. I shall not, therefore, go to Comayagua until there is a fair prospect of my finding a government that is not just on the eve of dissolution.

Circular of the government of Costa Rica.

OFFICE OF MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
NATIONAL PALACE, SAN JOSE,
Costa Rica, October 24, 1873.

SIR: The official and semi-official press of Central America has published the treaty of alliance concluded at Managua on the 26th of August last between the government of Nicaragua and Don Buenaventura Carazo, representative of Guatemala and Salvador, which treaty has been approved by the congress of Nicaragua. Having this document in view, the framers of which have completely forgotten the most solemn previous conventions, the most common principles of international rights, the forms most constantly in use among nations, and every species of consideration and respect which ought to be observed among governments, especially people who belong to the same family, and who at one time formed one national body, and who in the future are destined to renew this union from the same identity of interests, the government of Costa Rica cannot remain indifferent. She must raise her voice to vindicate herself against the calumnious charges which are made against her, to repel the menaces, and to protest against the intervention of the other sister republics in matters which concern Costa Rica alone. It is to this end that the undersigned has received instructions from his government to address the other governments with whom it has relations, for the purpose of setting forth its policy respecting the other states of Central America, and of making a statement of the acts which preceded that convention, and the compacts infringed by the government of Nicaragua in concluding the same. Notwithstanding that the alliance stipulated for in the treaty appears now to be only defensive, the government of Costa Rica, however much she may desire peace, cannot delude herself, and is under the necessity of considering it offensive as well as defensive, and adopted by these three governments in opposition to her tranquillity and independence. Thus it is that she is forced to assume a position in which she must and does decline all responsibility for the consequences which may follow this treaty, so unjust and injurious to the government of a sister republic, with whom they were at peace and on terms of friendship. The administrations which governed the republic of Guatemala and Salvador having been overturned in 1871, in consequence of events which took place in that year, the government of Costa Rica hailed with joy the new administrations which succeeded, as well because of her duty to accept the governments which those people had chosen for themselves, as because of the true principles of liberty and progress proclaimed, which were in accord with the sentiments of the administration of Costa Rica. Unfortunately the peace was disturbed in the republic of Guatemala in consequence of the efforts made by the reactionists to re-establish the fallen regime. So far as Costa Rica was concerned, she only lamented this disturbance, and desired the re-establishment of tranquillity and the good of her fellow-citizens. In the mean-time, the government of that republic, so soon as it was installed, doing due justice to Costa Rica, opened official relations, which the previously existing government had for so many years refused to entertain; at the same time it accredited near this cabinet a minister plenipotentiary with whom a treaty of peace and friendship was adjusted. A short time afterward another minister was sent to change that treaty, as he professed, although this could not be done, because it had been approved neither by this government nor by that of Guatemala. It is likely that the said minister did not come to present this question. It is probable that the true object of this second mission was to endeavor to gain the aid of the government of Costa Rica for the expulsion of the reverend Fathers of the Company of Jesus who had taken refuge in Nicaragua, since, in the course of the conferences, Minister Nerida proposed a draught of an alliance, the object of which should be the expulsion of the Jesuits, for the purpose, he said, of fixing the principles of liberalism in Central America; and in order to interest Costa Rica, he hinted that, with the intervention of Guatemala, the boundary question between Costa Rica and Nicaragua could be settled in a manner favorable to the interests of Costa Rica. The government of the undersigned did not think it well to enter into such an alliance, because it involved an act of injustice and an inconvenience. It was unjust to interfere with the internal affairs of Nicaragua, obliging her government to expel persons to whom she believed it her duty to grant an asylum, and it was inconvenient for Costa Rica and for Nicaragua that the question of boundaries, which interested them alone, should be decided by the intervention of a third party acting, not in the capacity of a friend to both sides, but as an ally of one of them only. This refusal, however, did not produce any disagreement whatever. During the stay of Minister Nerida in Costa Rica he complained to the government of two acts which, he said, would certainly affect the neutrality of this republic in the internal questions of Guatemala, and impair the harmony which existed between the two governments. He complained of the enlistment which he said was taking place in Punta Arenas, and said he was sure that the General Sherman, belonging to the railroad company, was being armed in the port of Limon for the purpose of directing her attacks against the other states of Central America. Immediately upon receiving this intimation, the government directed that all acts of hostility against any other republic for which preparations might be making in the territory or waters of Costa Rica should be prevented. These orders were more than carried out, for the commandante at Limon did not simply prohibit everything of a warlike character from being transferred to her, but he placed a guard of soldiers on board, who did not leave her until she was ready to sail, being entirely unarmed. Afterward it was published that the General Sherman had been bought from the railroad company by some emigrants, and armed in the port of Colon, United States of Colombia. The government is sure that not a single Costa Rican was found on board of her.

The government of Costa Rica was entirely ignorant of this expedition, which she is so falsely said to have aided. The minister of Guatemala was here, and an account of these measures and their result given to him. This incident neither gave occasion for reclamation nor answer, and the relations between both cabinets have continued friendly until the present time. Relations with the government of Salvador have been maintained in perfect harmony, without a question to disturb the peace. In respect to these two republics, therefore, the government of Costa Rica has no reason even to suspect that they have any motive for complaint. In regard to the republic of Nicaragua, the undersigned must confess that, although a friendly and fraternal tone has been maintained, yet at bottom a lack of cordial feeling exists on account of this boundary-question, which is being debated between the two republics. But it must be acknowledged that, if this question exists to-day, it was called into being on the part of Nicaragua, in the year 1870, by the Executive's putting in doubt, before his Congress, the validity of the treaty of limits, which was concluded in the year 1858, and which had been accepted and executed by both sides for the space of twelve years. Had it not been for this occurrence, both republics, whose interests are so identical, would have continued friendly. It cannot be denied that the question in itself is a grave one. If the treaty of 1858 should be declared null and void, as is demanded by Nicaragua, Costa Rica would be freed from the obligation, which this agreement imposes upon her, to keep aloof from the shore of the great lake and from that of the San Juan; in fact, her interest would be to recover the limits which she formerly possessed, and to which she has a right, according to ancient titles. Nicaragua, also, in view of the construction of the interoceanic canal, desires to possess this route, to the exclusion of Costa Rica. Even now she also takes the highest interest in the Colorado River, which unquestionably belongs to Costa Rica throughout its whole extent. Notwithstanding this ground for dispute between the two countries, and although on various occasions they have discussed the question with a good deal of warmth, it has been agreed on both sides never to resort to extreme measures, but to procure an amicable settlement by common consent or by arbitration, which means has lately been proposed and has been accepted by the government of Costa Rica, with the proviso that the right of Costa Rica to Guanacaste should not be called into question, for reasons stated in the President's message to the Congress of Costa Rica on the 1st of May of this year. It could not be otherwise. Between Costa Rica and Nicaragua a solemn compact exists, which precludes the possibility of war between the two republics. As this stipulation is of such vital importance in showing exactly the conduct of Nicaragua, the undersigned will copy literally the first three articles of the treaty of peace and friendship drawn up in this city on the 30th of July, 1868, between Messrs. Julian Volio and José Maria Zelaya, the first having been commissioned by the government of Costa Rica and the second by Nicaragua, which read thus:

"ARTICLE 1. There shall be constant peace and perpetual and sincere friendship between the republic of Costa Rica and the republic of Nicaragua.

"ART. 2. Never in any case, therefore, shall the said republics go to war. Should any differences occur between them, they shall furnish the necessary explanations, and if they do not settle the difficulty and re-establish a good understanding, they shall resort to the arbitration of a friendly nation

"ART. 3. If, unfortunately, any nation should go to war with Costa Rica or Nicaragua, the high contracting parties agree, in the most absolute manner, not to make an offensive alliance or to lend any aid whatever to the enemies of either of the two republics; but they declare that this does not prevent them from concluding defensive alliances for the defense of their respective territories in case of invasion."

Not having lately received any complaints from the government of Nicaragua, or any questions concerning any acts which could be interpreted as hostile to the tranquillity of Nicaragua, the government of Costa Rica ought to rest tranquil in the faith of the treaties; that is, if these have any significance in the relations among peoples and governments. Besides, the government of Costa Rica had other reasons to think that it had a guarantee from the government of Nicaragua. It felt implicit confidence in the personal character of the head of that republic, whose antecedents, in its opinion, were in favor of peace between the two republics, that he would exercise his influence, if he had any in the government, for the good of Costa Rica, instead of promoting revolutions in the neighboring republics. On account of all these antecedents, it is easy to understand why the government of the undersigned deemed the report unworthy of special attention when it was announced that the governments of Guatemala and Salvador had accredited a legation near the government of Managua. Being at peace and in harmony with both of those republics, having a solemn treaty with Nicaragua, which made war impossible, since it provided means for the settlement of any difference that might arise, this government paid no heed to the published statements which declared that the legation was hostile to Costa Rica.

Thus it was that, resting its faith on these bases, the government gave all its attention to the work of the railroad, and even thought to make it interoceanic, not only for the good of Costa Rica, but of all Central America and all the nations of the earth, when she was surprised by the treaty of alliance between the three republics, which was published for the first time in the Official Bulletin of Salvador. It is not necessary to enter into an analysis of this document, so highly offensive and menacing to the dignity, tranquillity, and independence of Costa Rica; it is sufficient simply to read it to perceive that its whole spirit is of a low, personal character that should never enter into negotiations on so grave a question. Apart from the opprobrious terms of the treaty toward the legitimately established government of a sovereign nation; apart from the calumnious accusations which it contains, there is at the bottom of it a provocation which is almost equivalent to a declaration of war, and this although not a single note had been addressed to this government asking for explanations or showing in any manner that there existed cause for complaint, so that the government of Costa Rica might have an opportunity to explain its conduct. It is surprising that the three states mentioned should have thought proper to act in violation of that which is prescribed by the laws and usages of nations in similar cases; but more especially is this surprising in the case of Nicaragua, with which country there existed rigorous compacts for the prevention of such an event. That government ought, if she had any complaint, to have addressed the government of Costa Rica, asking explanations or demanding satisfaction, and, not being satisfied with the explanations, or satisfaction having been denied, she should have resorted to arbitration, as mentioned in article second of the treaty of peace and friendship above referred to. Had the government of Costa Rica opposed all these means of conciliation, then that government would have a right to ally itself as it thought fit, and even to declare war. By acting as she has, the government of Nicaragua has openly infringed the stipulations of that treaty, and Costa Rica is justified in providing for her security and in vindicating her offended dignity without regard to the treaty. Even without having had official notice of the agreement adjusted at Managua, the chief magistrate of Costa Rica, though he had only heard rumors concerning that alliance, solemnly declared that he would not raise a single soldier in Costa Rica to go and invade any of the other states. This programme shall be maintained, notwithstanding the provocation contained in the treaty of Managua. The government and people of Costa Rica desire to work, and know too well the value of peace to permit themselves to break it thoughtlessly; but at the same time they know how to protect their territory and to preserve their independence. The government of the undersigned cannot foresee what measures prudence will counsel them to adopt for their protection. This depends upon the Rivas-Carazo treaty and the conduct of the three mentioned states; but from this time forth we decline all responsibility which may arise from the unjustifiable acts which have produced the present state of feeling.

I beg you to submit these considerations to the government which you represent, and to accept the assurance of the distinguished appreciation with which I have the honor to subscribe myself,

Your very obedient servant,

VICENTE HERRERA.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that on my return here I found that President Barrios, with two of his chief ministers and his counselor of state, accompanied by a small military escort, had gone to the borders of Honduras and Salvador to confer with President Gonzalez, of Salvador, in regard (especially) to the successor to President Arias, of Honduras. It is reported that Arias has consented to vacate his office of President in favor of any one who may be selected by the Presidents of Salvador and Guatemala. My latest information is that Leiva is likely to be chosen on account of his popularity, although he lacks the military prestige which seems so necessary to a continuance in power in these states, and is supposed not to be in full accord with the political sentiments of Presidents Barrios and Gonzalez. His reputation is that of an honest man, of deliberate judgment, and in favor of the speediest economical reforms of which Honduras is susceptible in her present unhappy financial and industrial condition. He is also reputed to be quite wealthy, as the result of his good sense and prudent management. I propose, as soon as he is inaugurated, and there is some degree of quiet restored in Honduras, to go direct to Comayagua, to present my letter of credence.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you herewith a copy of my note of this date, addressed to the minister of foreign affairs of Costa Rica, in reply to the circular of which I sent you a translated copy with my No. 52. After carefully considering the whole subject it occurred to me to be wiser to limit myself to a tender of the good offices of our Government, without engaging in any discussion to show why they should be cheerfully and gratefully accepted. The statesmen of these countries are said to be very argumentative, and I did not wish to incur the risk of failing to do a practical good by an unintentional invitation to a discussion that would settle nothing.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, November 15, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the interesting circular issued by your government, under date 24th ultimo, touching the late treaty between Guatemala, Salvador and Nicaragua. You will please accept my thanks.

I beg to reiterate to you more formally the substance of what I had the honor to address verbally to your esteemed predecessor, Mr. Montufor, during our last interview, about the 19th of August. Substantially, I stated to him, if without offense to either party, and by their joint consent, the good offices of my Government could be employed with a fair prospect of success in bringing to an honorable and peaceable settlement the long-vexed question of boundary between Costa Rica and Nicaragua, that I felt authorized to tender them. Since then I have made a similar offer to the government of Nicaragua, and I am pleased to inform you it was accepted with cordiality by the president and his minister of foreign affairs. I now make the offer to your government, accompanied with the remark that as the Government of the United States is only animated in this tender of good offices by its friendly disposition to the states at variance upon this question of boundary, and is not willing to seem to assume either the part of interfering in affairs of other states without invitation, or to have her benevolent intentions become liable to misconstruction, that you will be pleased to understand, if your government considers the discussion of the question of boundary with Nicaragua has been removed beyond the limits of diplomacy, I shall thank you to say so in the same frank and friendly spirit which inspires this note.

MANAGUA, November 11, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency the inclosed communication, which under this date I address to the minister of foreign relations of Costa Rica, in answer to the circular-note which he addressed to the diplomatic and consular bodies on the 24th of October last.

Requesting your excellency to bring this document to the knowledge of your Government, I have the honor to subscribe myself your excellency's very humble servant,
A. H. RIVAS.

[Inclosure in 1 in No. 60.—Translation.]

Circular of the government of Nicaragua.

NATIONAL PALACE,
Managua, November 11, 1873.

SIR: The ministry under my charge has received the circular-note that your ministry thought proper to address, on the 24th of October last, to the governments with which the republic of Costa Rica holds intercourse, on the subject of the treaty of alliance, concluded on the 26th of August previous, between Nicaragua, Salvador, and Guatemala.

Your excellency says that, in view of that document, wherein solemn pre-existing engagements are completely forgotten, as well as the most common rules of international law, the forms in constant use among nations, and the respect and consideration due from one government to another, your government cannot remain indifferent, but must raise its voice to answer the injurious accusations and the threats made against it, and also to protest against the intervention of the other republics in affairs which concern Costa Rica exclusively:

Your excellency adds that, with this object, you have received instructions from your government to make a statement of its policy in regard to the other states respecting the acts which preceded the convention in question, and of the nature of the treaties broken by Nicaragua by the act of signing it; because, however much your government may wish it, it cannot consider that treaty under any aspect save that of an offensive and defensive alliance, concluded against the peace and independence of Costa Rica, and consequently it has to assume such an attitude as is proper in the situation in which it has been placed, declining at once all responsibility for the consequences that may be originated by said treaty, so unjust and so injurious to your excellency's government.

Your excellency proposes to show in that statement, that since the triumph of the liberal revolution of 1871, in the republics of Salvador and Guatemala, up to the date of the circular-note herein referred to, no correspondence has taken place between Costa Rica and the other republics without expressions and acts of cordiality, there not being the least motive to suspect the existence between them of any cause of complaint; but, on the contrary, that everything has tended to show that they were to be considered as being in a state of profound peace, and perfect harmony with each other.

In regard to this republic, your excellency acknowledged that the existing relations, though friendly and fraternal, were somewhat impaired by coldness on account of the boundary question, the existence of which your excellency attributes to Nicaragua, because the executive power of this republic manifested some doubt before the congress of 1870 upon the validity of the boundary treaty concluded on the 15th of April, 1858, accepted and acted upon by both parties during twelve consecutive years.

Your excellency says that the question in itself is a grave one, because, if the treaty were annulled, as Nicaragua desires, Costa Rica would be free from the obligation which is thereby imposed upon it of keeping at a distance from the great lake and a part of the shore of the San Juan River, and it would be to the interest of Costa Rica to regain the limits it formerly possessed, to which it believes it has a right according to ancient titles. You further say that Nicaragua, for its part, with a prospect of opening the inter-oceanic canal, wishes to possess this route, to the exclusion of Costa Rica, and even now has a great interest in the Colorado River, which unquestionably belongs to that republic, throughout its extent; that in spite of this cause of difference between the two countries, and although at various times the question has been discussed with some warmth on either side, it has been agreed upon never to resort to extreme measures, but to arrange all disputes amicably by mutual consent or by arbitration, which method was lately accepted by Costa Rica, with the proviso that its right to Guanacaste should not be questioned, for the reason assigned in the presidential message of the 1st of May of this year.

As a proof of these assertions and of the prudence and justice that guide the acts of the government of Costa Rica, your excellency copied the first three articles of the treaty of friendship signed between Costa Rica and this republic; adding, that no communication having been addressed to your government for some time past by that of Nicaragua stating any cause of complaint, or demanding explanation of any act that might be construed as hostile to the tranquillity of Nicaragua, your government felt able to rest tranquil upon the faith of the treaties, believing them to have some significance in the relations between nations and governments; that, besides, the government of Costa Rica had another reason for believing itself secured by that of Nicaragua, and had full confidence in the personal character of the chief magistrate of this republic, whose previous conduct was, in its judgment, a guarantee of peace between the two countries; that with such a conviction it was to the interest of Costa Rica to use the influence of the government, if it had any, in arresting rather than precipitating the revolutionary movement in this republic, postponing it for the legal opportunity of the coming elections.

Your excellency says that, in view of all these precedents, your government remained tranquil, directing all its attention to the important work of the railroad already undertaken, and even thought to make it interoceanic for the good of Central America and the world, when it was painfully surprised by the treaty of alliance concluded by the three republics, which in its form and purport is highly offensive and threatening to the dignity, peace, and independence of Costa Rica, adding that its simple perusal reveals that in its conclusion nothing has been considered but private passions, individual hatred and prejudices, founded on superficial views, that ought never to influence negotiations of such importance and gravity; and after expounding the conduct that ought to be observed by states before agreeing to any alliance, and expressing especial surprise at that observed by Nicaragua, with which other treaties existed, your excellency ends by stating that the government of Costa Rica feels authorized to provide for the security of that republic, and to vindicate its offended dignity, without injury to the ties that unite it to Nicaragua; that in spite of the provocation offered to Costa Rica by said treaty, your government will maintain its programme of not raising a single Costa Rican soldier to invade the other states, on which it throws all the responsibility of the events that may occur in consequence of the adoption of measures suggested by prudence and necessity to provide for the security of the republic.

Mr. Minister, I have considered with due attention the allegations contained in your note, which I have brought to the notice of his excellency the President of the republic, in accordance with whose instructions I proceed to answer them one by one and in the order in which they are stated, having at the same time received orders to transmit copies of this dispatch to the governments to which your excellency addressed the circular-note in question, so that the nations interested may be able to judge with impartiality and accuracy concerning this important question.

Your excellency lays aside the vital question which led to the alliance of the states, making them appear as if moved by the impulse of secondary interests, or by an illegitimate wish to interfere with the internal affairs of your republic, which unquestionably only concern the people of Costa Rica.

In consideration of this view, so highly offensive to the honor of the states, and particularly to that of Nicaragua, which is the only one that has pending questions with your republic, it is the duty of my government to raise its voice most energetically against it, and to make manifest the true motives which have induced it to adopt the line of conduct it has recently followed in regard to its relations with the other states of Central America.

As may be seen by all the stipulations of the treaty, the object of the alliance is not the acquisition of material advantages, much less to favor the intervention of the states in affairs that do not concern them, but to provide for their mutual security against attacks which have been considered as proceeding from prominent members of the Costa Rican cabinet. Nor can any one dispute their right to adopt that measure, which vitally interests them; and if the Costa Ricans have any duty to fulfill under such grave circumstances, it is to investigate the facts and to lend support to their government, if those acts have been performed justly and legally and with a view to the advancement of the general interest; or to call them to account if, on the contrary, they have acted in violation of law, both domestic and international, and have disregarded the usages practiced by civilized and Christian nations and the obligations by which a nation is bound as regards its neighbors.

In the statement made by your excellency of the conduct of your government, you do not mention the protection received from it by certain exiles from the other republics; protection exceeding what humanity and other social considerations demand. Far be it from me and from the government of whose sentiments I have the honor to be the interpreter to criticise the generous and humane act of granting an asylum to citizens cast away from their homes by revolution. Nicaragua has also received and protected with its laws thousands of those unfortunate beings, even at the risk of its own peace, and although heavy expense was thereby incurred; but at the same time it has been very careful to prevent the asylum granted from being prejudicial to its neighbors, watching the emigrants very closely, and refusing entrance into the republic to those whose residence there, on account of their position in regard to the established governments, was deemed dangerous to the peace of the states whence they came. These acts have been a proof of the prudence with which the government of Nicaragua has acted with respect to those emigrants, it being now quite notorious that nearly all of them took an active part in the attempt made in the north of Honduras to upset the existing governments of Central America.

Can your excellency say as much of the conduct of your government? Even admitting that the expedition of the steamer "General Sherman" was undertaken in spite of the vigilance of the authorities, and that the conduct of the emigrants who concocted it during their stay in Costa Rica was so cautious as to conceal from the cabinet their intention to disturb the peace in the other states, how can the fact be explained that some of the leaders of that expedition, after having established their pretended constitutional government on the island of Utila, returned to your republic to reside in it, with the confidence of the soldier who returns to his quarters to rest after the fatigues of a campaign? How can the fact be explained that the semi-official press of your republic has been devoted to the publication of the most absurd news and of the most senseless effusions of the opponents of those governments?

I beg your excellency to allow me to say that such precedents were not of a nature to induce your government to rest upon the security of not having given cause for complaint, especially when the free press of all Central America had denounced the conduct of your government as hostile to the peace of all.

Be this said in regard to the republics of Guatemala, Honduras, and Salvador.

With respect to Nicaragua, the inclination on the part of your government to provoke a rupture has been very evident. In the year 1870, when the present president of your republic held the supreme power provisionally, the provisional government committed an act of incivility toward Nicaragua, by declaring void the Montealegro-

Jimenez treaty relative to the Ayon-Chevalier contract for the canal, without giving notice to this government, which the common usages of etiquette and the nature of the matter rendered obligatory upon your government. This proceeding was the more unjustifiable as the treaty thus annulled had been sanctioned by the congress of this republic. This it was that revived the old boundary question, not the doubt presented to the congress of Nicaragua concerning the validity of the treaty of 1858, which was due to that inconsiderate act on the part of your government, an act which, if allowed to pass without contradiction, would have subjected this republic to a degrading tutelage. Nevertheless, after some discussion of this vexatious question, it remained unsettled, and the relations between the two governments continued as if no such disagreeable incident had occurred, it being worthy of notice that the congress of the republic has abstained from saying a word about the proposed doubt, so as to leave to the respective cabinets the friendly adjustment of a question which properly belongs to them to settle.

If the question has again been revived, and has even assumed alarming proportions, it is not certainly by reason of provocations on the part of my government, which in this, as in other questions, has always tried to place itself in a defensive attitude, repelling the exaggerated pretensions of your cabinet, and at the same time seeking all the means of conciliation for the sake of the well-being of both countries.

The people of Nicaragua and of Central America generally have not failed to observe the marked disposition of your excellency's government to seek causes of discord with this republic, which, from the beginning, has revealed the desire of attaining some ulterior object, nor have they been blind to the attempts of the head of the Costa Rican cabinet to acquire great prestige in Nicaragua, an attempt which first became evident at the time of the conferences at Rivas, and has subsequently been shown by the unofficial acts of the Costa Rican legation in this republic, and by the official press, which has more than once expressed the opinion that the extreme point sustained by my government in the pending question was the isolated opinion of the administration circle, mean, egotistical, and narrow, against the true sentiments of the people, whom they have tried to represent as more favorable to the pretensions of the cabinet of Costa Rica.

It might be said that this opinion was an error of the writers charged with the defense of your government; but the true meaning of those words cannot be mistaken when they are examined and compared with the official acts to which they relate. Such are, for instance, the acts of Juan Carrié, on the Colorado River, concerning which my government complained, and the refusal of that cabinet to give the frank and friendly explanations of those acts which the similarity of interests of both republics and the cordial relations existing between the two governments demanded.

In spite of the efforts which it was in the power of the government of Nicaragua to make, and which were made to re-establish harmony, the Nicaraguans have always suspected that your government is meditating plans against the peace of this republic; and even in the other states the same opinion prevails. Thus it was that, when my government established the legation to mediate between Salvador and Honduras, many insinuations were made to it that it would act wisely in instructing our plenipotentiary to negotiate an alliance with those governments, as the surest means of protecting the republic against the stratagems of your cabinet.

Although my government duly appreciated the justice of such insinuations, it would not act upon them, hoping that its conciliatory conduct would inspire better sentiments in official circles in your republic. The commissioner, however, being compelled by the public opinion of the country and by the prevailing ideas in the republic of Salvador, concluded sub spe rati the Arbizu-Carazo treaty, of which, no doubt, your excellency received notice. In that convention it was expressly stipulated that the republic of Salvador should make common cause with Nicaragua in the settlement of the boundary question with Costa Rica, thus declaring justice to be on the side of this republic.

My government, however, not listening to the outcry of a great number of Nicaraguans, who saw in that treaty the salvation of the dearest interests of the republic, refrained from approving it, for the sake of peace and the positive interests of both countries, and because it is profoundly convinced that the pending question with that republic should be settled entirely by diplomacy.

In spite of this friendly and conciliatory conduct, your excellency's government has not desisted from its disturbing and threatening course. It has imported extraordinary quantities of arms and munitions of war, whereby this people has been justly alarmed, the warlike stores in question being far in excess of what your republic requires, either to maintain order or to provide for its defense in case of an invasion.

My government has repeatedly been urged to demand an explanation from that of your excellency of an act which in all countries is considered as a threat by neighboring nations; but it has refrained from taking this step for two reasons: first, because it has become convinced that your cabinet does not like to give clear explanations, as in the case of Carrié; and second, because it has relied upon the good sense of the Costa Rican people, who, whatever may be the character of their President, can never be induced to run after adventurers as if they were a pack of idlers and vagabonds. My government has felt and still feels confident that no war will be made against Nicaragua with Costa Rican soldiers. Would to God it could feel equal confidence in the personal character of some members of the Costa Rican cabinet, so that no suspicion could be entertained on account of such unwarranted acts, only calculated to disturb the peace of this republic.

Unfortunately, however, some blind opponents of this government, to whom patriotism is unknown, have felt themselves supported by the Costa Rican ruler. In small countries like these the steps and words of all the inhabitants are counted. Thus my country has been made acquainted, not officially, because the subject is not worthy of such means of information, but in a reliable form, with the conversations and mutual offers exchanged between members of your cabinet and some ungrateful sons of this republic.

Truly there has existed a close alliance between your government and its friends and the enemies of Nicaragua, so that, in the general questions of both countries, the opponents of this government are on the side of the Costa Ricans. Everything that is written in your country against the interests of Nicaragua or its government is at once reprinted here by those same opponents, and vice versa, all that the enemies of this government write is copied in the semi-official newspapers of your republic, with comments in support of the ideas therein expressed.

But even if my government had been inclined to doubt the facts brought to its notice, have they not been confirmed, one by one, by the semi-official press of your republic, showing, in the clearest manner, the relation existing between the designs of your cabinet and those of the enemies of order in this country?

But what reveals more clearly the alliance existing between the enemies of this government and the present administration of Costa Rica is the favorable reception met with in that republic by all who present themselves in the character of enemies of the administration in Nicaragua.

I should prefer not to speak of the money brought from Costa Rica by Don Paulino Salamanca, with the object of creating a revolution in this country, because this incident affects the personal character of your excellency. But what has occurred since the discovery of Salamanca's treason is so serious, and shows so clearly at the same time the by no means friendly sentiment of your cabinet toward Nicaragua, that I should fail to fulfill my duty, if from personal considerations I were to omit in a document like this all the facts that have shaped the conduct of my government toward that of your excellency.

Your excellency has become aware, through the official publications of this republic, that Don Paulino Salamanca, having been charged with being the bearer of the money sent by the president of Costa Rica for the purpose of creating a revolution in Nicaragua, his apprehension was ordered for the purpose of obtaining proof of the fact; that Salamanca escaped from the escort that took him, and that he and Colonel Finoco, who received half the money, appeared some little time afterward in your republic. The reception which these traitors to Nicaragua have met with from the public functionaries of Costa Rica, the protection lately extended to them to enable them to carry out their treacherous designs, the same Salamanca having been the ring-leader in the piratical enterprises which have been organized in that republic for the purpose of disturbing the peace of Nicaragua and Honduras, Finoco himself having been the military agent of these undertakings—all this forms a concatenation of events tending solely to the object of destroying the precious gift of peace which this people enjoys, thanks to the conciliatory and impartial, as well as watchful, policy of my government. To cast a doubt upon the intentions that have dictated this conduct would be utterly in violation of the rules of logic.

But there is no necessity to resort to conjectures in regard to the views and inclinations of your government, when your excellency refers, in the dispatch which I am answering, to the existence of that alliance with the enemies of this government, emphatically saying that it was to the interest of your government to restrain rather than precipitate the revolutionary movement, postponing it for the legal opportunity of the coming elections.

Is not this, Mr. Minister, assuming to direct the electioneering movement in Nicaragua from the interior of your cabinet? By what right does your excellency's government propose to interfere in such matters, which concern the Nicaraguans alone? Does it not reveal a design of unlawful intervention and the strange pretension, to which I have referred, on the part of the chief magistrate of your republic, to obtain prestige in Nicaragua?

It was the intention of my government to make a statement to your excellency in regard to several facts herein mentioned, and seriously to call the attention of the whole nation and its worthy representatives to said facts, so that, being aware of the conduct of their officers, they might check in time those abuses which could not fail to entangle the nation in serious complications.

The sending of the embassy from the other states somewhat modified the intentions of my government, as, instead of making this statement separately, it preferred to make it in common with its allies, according to the spirit of the treaty of alliance which was concluded, but always with the design of enabling the Costa Rican nation duly to appreciate the official and unofficial acts of its officers, by which they have compromised its neutrality, violated its treaties, and endangered its peace and well being.

As the subject of this note is not the question of boundaries, but of the peace and security of Nicaragua and of all Central America, I will confine myself to contradicting three assertions of your excellency, only because they are made in a document of high diplomatic importance.

Your excellency asserts, in the first place, that Costa Rica formerly possessed the southern shore of the lake and the right shore of the river San Juan throughout its extent, and that it thinks it has a right to that boundary according to its old titles.

Secondly. That Nicaragua, having in view the opening of an interoceanic canal, wishes to possess that route to the exclusion of Costa Rica.

Thirdly. That Costa Rica has accepted the arbitration proposed by Nicaragua, with the proviso that its right to Guanacaste shall not be questioned.

All three assertions are utterly and notoriously inexact.

Costa Rica has never possessed the lake nor the river throughout its extent; for I do not think that your excellency means to call possession the precarious occupancy which the government of your republic held in those waters in 1857, which led to the conclusion of the boundary treaty of 1858.

It is true that Nicaragua desires to have no impediment in the exercise of its sovereign right to contract for the work of the canal or any other interoceanic communication; but your excellency has no reason to assume that Nicaragua wishes to enjoy the advantages of such communication to the exclusion of Costa Rica, it being quite notorious that the tendency of the measures taken by this government is to secure from enterprises of this kind the same advantages in favor of the citizens of Costa Rica as for those of Nicaragua.

The third assertion is contradicted by the very documents from which your excellency quotes. In the message of the 1st of May it is said "I believe that in no case whatever, nor with any motive, can we consent to have our right to the territory of Guanacaste questioned;" and in the report of the minister of foreign relations, dated the 13th day of the same month, to which the president alludes, it is said "the proposition for arbitration has not been accepted by Costa Rica, for the reasons which I will present to your enlightened consideration."

He goes on to state these reasons, which are substantially those given by the president, adding that the boundary treaty is onerous to Costa Rica, on account of the valuable concession made by it to Nicaragua, and ends by asking, in the name of the president, for authority to break that treaty with the consent of Nicaragua. "The treaty once broken," he says, "we will maintain the statu quo, but without the prospect of finding ourselves obliged to withdraw from the limits which nature has drawn between the two countries, viz, the lake and the whole of the San Juan River."

"The Costa Ricans will not then forever see that strip of land, which, in the high equinoctial heats, prevents them from quenching their thirst in the waters of a lake partly formed by their large rivers."

Nobody can but perceive the warlike disposition which guided the hand of the minister when he wrote the foregoing words, and I have quoted them with the object of rectifying their inaccuracy, only because they confirm the views of my government with respect to the sentiments of that of your excellency toward Nicaragua.

I have referred to the question of limits, because your excellency has been pleased to allude to it in the dispatch, and not because I believe it to be at all connected with the one now pending among all the states of Central America.

Let us now pass to the true state of things.

After showing the state of the boundary question, your excellency copies the first three articles of the treaty of friendship concluded between this republic and that of Costa Rica, in order to show to the Costa Rican people and to impartial nations that Nicaragua makes alliances for the purpose of supporting its pretensions in the arrangement of that question by force.

Mr. Minister, I repeat what has very often been said by my government, and clearly describes the treaty of friendship. The question of limits had not the least influence in the conclusion of that convention. If such had been the wishes of my government, it would have accepted the Arbizú-Carazo treaty, which expressly treats of this subject; but it is firmly convinced that this question belongs exclusively to the diplomacy of both countries; that nothing can be arranged by force; and that whatsoever is done under its influence will vanish as soon as the force ceases to be exerted.

What causes, then, have brought about the alliance?

The treaty itself says: "It is the conviction of the allies that the present administration of Costa Rica is performing acts of hostility against them, violating the existing treaties, the usages which prevail among nations, and the respect and consideration due from one government to another."

But your excellency says that no explanations have been asked, nor has the time arrived for arbitration.

Mr. Minister, allow me to tell you that you have not appreciated at its just value the personal character of the chief magistrate of this republic, if you have thought that, in view of his essentially pacific and conciliatory disposition, he is capable of folding his arms in blind confidence in the presence of acts directly hostile to the peace of this republic, committed without the necessary tact to disguise appearances, and that he would send his commissioner to Belgium, or to some other neutral nation, to enter into a discussion upon flagrant acts, while, without any procedure, without respect or consideration, our enemies should be stirring up with impunity all the bad elements which society in this republic contains, paralyzing its commerce, its agriculture, and all its vital movements, all with the design of establishing a government that would permit the sacrifice of the national integrity and of the dearest interests of the Nicaraguans.

If your excellency believes, in good faith, that a government can rest tranquil upon the basis of treaties in presence of notorious hostilities committed by the other party, how is it that your excellency, interpreting the intention of the treaty of alliance as a design to make war against your republic, declares your government thereby free from the obligations of the treaties by which it was bound to Nicaragua? Why do you not ask explanations in regard to their supposed intentions, and ask for arbitration? A step of this kind would be the more reasonable, inasmuch as the act of Nicaragua is official, frank, and explicit, but rests, according to your excellency, upon an erroneous basis.

But it seems that the obligations imposed by treaties and by international law must only be binding upon Nicaragua, leaving rights and guarantees as the patrimony of your excellency's government exclusively.

All the foregoing, Mr. Minister, shows that the treaty of alliance cannot have surprised your excellency's government at a moment when it was entirely occupied with the great enterprise of the railroad; on the contrary, it must have been on its guard against very serious events, both from without and from within, from the moment that enormous sums of money, obtained at a great sacrifice on the part of the nation, were diverted from their legitimate objects, and great quantities of arms and munitions of war were imported with a design to disturb the peace of its neighbors.

I conclude, Mr. Minister, by repelling the insulting supposition that the treaty of alliance was dictated by personal hatred and other base passions, which cannot be explained in the relations of one people with another, and much less in acts sealed with the explicit approbation of the nations interested.

I beg your excellency to bring the foregoing to the knowledge of your government, and to accept the assurance of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

A. H. RIVAS.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, containing a request that the printed circular accompanying it may be transmitted to my Government.

The circular has been carefully read and considered, and I have caused a translation to be made for the purpose of forwarding it to my Government by the next mail.

I avail myself of this occasion to say that I have written to the government of Costa Rica, formally tendering my good offices for the settlement of the question of limits with Nicaragua, and that if it is possible for me to do so, I shall leave for Costa Rica by the next steamer, to see President Guardia in person upon that subject, and also upon the important subject of a meeting, at some convenient time and place, of the presidents of the five Central American states, with a view of establishing more amicable relations between them. All profess to desire peace, and the respective states need nothing so much to enable them to embark upon careers of prosperity as for the people and foreigners to be assured that the public order will not be disturbed. It is probable you will receive a communication on this subject from the government of Guatemala by this mail, as my mission to Costa Rica on the latter subject will be undertaken at the instance of President Barrios, who tells me he has recently discussed the matter with President Gonzalez, of Salvador. It is possible that President Guardia may not be disposed to listen to such unauthorized overtures as I can make, but it seems to me he will do so; and, whether he does or not, it is my duty, as well as pleasure, to make any reasonable exertions to maintain peace in these states, if I can do so without a compromise of my own dignity or that of the Government I have the honor to represent.

Your excellency will be pleased to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

Your obedient servant,

GEO. WILLIAMSON.

No. 61.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, Nov. 26, 1873. (Received December 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that President Barrios has returned. Both of the ministers who accompanied him called to see me, and stated that at the conference held at Chingo it was agreed between Presidents Barrios and Gonzalez that Leiva was to be elected President of Honduras by the constituent assembly of that State, which is called to assemble (by the actual President, Arias,) on the 1st of December. Leiva was present at the conference, and, although President Arias was not there in person, through his representative he expressed a willingness to abide by the decision of the constituent assembly, and turn over the government to Leiva or whoever else might be elected. These gentlemen also state there is no doubt of the election of Leiva, and in their opinion there is no doubt of his now being in perfect accord with the political principles of Presidents Barrios and Gonzalez. It is proper to say these gentlemen add that the governments of Guatemala and Salvador do not put any restraint (nor do they propose to put any) upon the action of the people of Honduras in the selection of their chief magistrate. The inefficiency and great unpopularity of Arias and the reputed universal popularity of Leiva seem to justify the opinion that the people of Honduras will be much pleased with the change of Presidents. I also called upon President Barrios, who confirmed all of the above statements. He said, moreover, that he thought a good opportunity now existed for the pacification of the Central American States, if, through me, the chief magistrates of the several states could be brought together face to face to talk over matters of difference and common interest. He said no other person but the representative of the United States Government could accomplish that desirable object; and, I may add, he was flattering enough to pay some high compliments to my personal address and tact in the management of such a delicate question. I then asked him what would be the main questions to be discussed at such a conference. In his usual frank and off-hand style, he answered substantially as follows: 1st, a settlement of present misunderstandings. 2nd, a treaty involving the following points: first, free trade between the states of articles either in the raw or manufactured state, if produced in said states; second, uniformity of postal system; third, uniformity of currency; fourth, concentration of their foreign representation in the hands of one person with a view to a uniform foreign policy; fifth, a settlement by arbitration or treaty of the question of limits between Nicaragua and Costa Rica; sixth, a treaty involving a pledge upon the part of each state that it will not harbor revolutionists, or permit revolutionary expeditions to be fitted out in its ports or territory, or allow revolutionary plots to be concocted to disturb the peace of any other state. I had previously talked over all these points, which were quite familiar to me, and which I found to be acceptable to the governments of Salvador and Nicaragua. The President assured me that Leiva, when elected President of Honduras, would also approve these views, and would cheerfully consent to the conference proposed. The only President, then, to approach is Guardia, of Costa Rica. I replied to President Barrios that I was willing to undertake to obtain President Guardia's consent, and, if possible, would leave on the next steamer. I also stated to him I could not leave on that steamer unless my mail was delivered to me before leaving, as my last dates from Washington were the 9th of September. It is understood, therefore, if the mail arrives in time for me to examine it before the departure of the steamer of the 1st proximo, that I will go to Costa Rica; and if the mail does not so arrive, I shall postpone my trip until the steamer of the 10th.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I embarked to-day on the "Labrador" for Punta Arenas, in Costa Rica, at the urgent instance of the government of Guatemala, for the purpose of seeing whether it is practicable to bring about a meeting of the Presidents of the five republics, or southern states, in order to talk over and, if possible, settle their differences. Having acquired some knowledge of these people, I must confess that my trip seems to be rather quixotic, but taking all things into consideration, it has seemed to me best to undertake it. I consider all the governments in Central America as merely personal, except, perhaps, those of Salvador and Nicaragua. In those two states the administration of public affairs is conducted by the respective Executives with a considerable regard to the forms of law and the constitutional provisions. In Nicaragua the Executive, so far, has appeared to be desirous not to overstep his authority; but this is owing to his habitual caution or timidity, rather than to any restraining influence of an organized public sentiment. In Salvador, I think, President Gonzalez is restrained in some measure by public sentiment, for, in my opinion, there is more of the genuine spirit of republican liberty in Salvador than in any of the five states. The standard is low, but it is to be hoped will be elevated in time. The intelligence comes to me from Honduras that Arias intends to prevent the meeting of the constitutional assembly, and defeat thereby the election of Leiva. I am informed he is trying to raise men and means, and by making the assertion that Leiva is but the creature of Guatemala and Salvador, is trying to arouse popular pride and indignation. Judging from his character and the obstinacy with which he has held on to his office, I should not be at all surprised if the news is true. It is probable he is encouraged by the reported prospect of war between Costa Rica and Nicaragua which would involve Guatemala and Salvador. There is no danger of such a war, although Guardia has placed the executive power (as it is called here) in the hands of Minister Gonzalez, and has assumed command of the army, which he tells us in a flaming manifesto. His people will not follow him, unless I am misinformed. None of the other states or their governments desire war, and hence I hope Guardia may be glad to have an opportunity presented to him to assume a more peaceful "rôle." Besides his own term of office depends much upon his personal presence at the capital. If he has any judgment or regard for himself or his country, he cannot go to war. I still believe Arias will be deposed and Leiva installed, even if it requires the joint powers of Guatemala and Salvador to accomplish that result. Hence if the meeting of the five Presidents occurs in a month or so, my belief is that Leiva will be one of the number.

No. 72.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Punta Arenas, Costa Rica, December 11, 1873. (Rec'd Dec. 30.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of the memorandum of the conversation had yesterday morning with President Guardia, the result of which I gave you in my No. 71, written immediately after its occurrence, so as to send by the ship then in port, bound for Panama. You will notice that Mr. Edwin Corbett, Her British Majesty's minister, took part in the interview and co-operated with me partly. Although I did not understand him to commit himself in the conversation to the plan of a personal conference of the five Presidents, yet I feel assured it meets his approval, and that his presence was taken by President Guardia as tantamount to an unqualified indorsement. So far everything looks favorable to the proposed personal conference, but I cannot say I feel certain it will take place, or that the good consequences will flow from it which I should be glad to witness. My belief, however, is (if the meeting is held) it will lead to a better understanding, if not to good-will, between the several Presidents, and thereby give the tranquillity to these states so much needed, and which, under these peculiar systems of personal governments, seems unattainable at present by any other means. The only man I have any doubt of is President Guardia. * * * A short time ago he placed the "executive power" in the hands of one of his friends and ministers, Gonzalez. In a few days afterward he resumed it, and Gonzalez and several of his advisers left the capital, it is presumed by order of the President. He retained the executive power for two days, accepted the resignation of all his ministers except two, and after appointing the two to perform all the ministerial duties, he placed the executive power in the hands of his uncle, Rafael Barroeta, who stills holds it nominally, while in truth Guardia is President and in command of the army as general-in-chief. These facts speak for themselves, and indicate a state of mind or condition of affairs not calculated to produce a conviction that President Guardia will attend the conference. On my way back to Guatemala I shall acquaint the Presidents of Nicaragua and Salvador with the result of the interview. If Leiva has been installed in Honduras I shall write him an unofficial note, or go to Comayagua to present my letter of credence if the state of the country will permit me.

PUNTA ARENAS, COSTA RICA, December 10, 1873.

Memorandum of conversation held this day between President Guardia, Edwin Corbett, esq. and Geo. Williamson, esq.

The conversation began by the two last-named gentlemen stating they felt assured the other republics of Central America, and especially Guatemala, were anxiously desirous of preserving and cultivating peaceful relations with Costa Rica. This assurance was given more emphatically for the states of Salvador and Nicaragua by the said George Williamson, esq., who had recently visited them and talked freely with their government officials and people, but in regard to the anxiety of the existing government of Guatemala for undisturbed peace with all the other Central American states the said Edwin Corbett, esq., and George Williamson were equally positive. President Guardia then stated he was as desirous of peace as any one could be, and he believed more so than the chief executives of the other states, because he and his country had more at stake than the others. He said that war would seriously embarrass (if it did not entirely prevent) the building of the Costa Rica Railroad, a grand enterprise which he had inaugurated, and in which his personal pride was involved as well as his sense of patriotic duty. His assurance of the pacific disposition of himself and the people of Costa Rica was quite strong. Mr. Williamson then stated he and Mr. Corbett had in their possession letters from the minister of foreign affairs of Guatemala, which they proposed to show to President Guardia, as they contained written assurances of the pacific intentions of that state. The letters were exhibited and read by President Guardia, and he stated that he had been advised of the discussion recently held between the Presidents of Guatemala and Salvador at Chingo, so far as it affected Costa Rica affairs; and that after hearing the peaceable views expressed at said meeting by said Presidents, he had suspended his preparations for this war which he had believed it was intended to wage against Costa Rica. He said he was prepared for war at that time, and could have landed on any part of the hostile coast fifteen hundred armed men. He expressed satisfaction that the newspaper attacks on him in Guatemala and Salvador had been stopped. Mr. Williamson then stated that, of his own motion, it had occurred to him, from his personal knowledge of the Presidents of Costa Rica, Guatemala, Salvador, and Nicaragua, and of the causes of misunderstanding between them, that, if they could be brought together face to face and talk over their affairs, a better feeling would result and a stop be put to the repeated threats of war and civil disturbances. The difficulty was to bring about such a meeting without a sacrifice of the official or personal dignity of any of the Presidents. He mentioned this subject first to the minister of foreign affairs of Guatemala, who told him the project of such a personal interview had been talked over at Chingo between Presidents Barrios and Gonzalez, and that Mr. Williamson had been mentioned in that interview as the person whose official position as minister to all the Central American states might enable him to invite such a personal conference. At the instance of the said minister and in his presence, and in the presence of Mr. Samayoa and others, government officials, Mr. Williamson had an interview with President Barrios on this subject. The President expressed himself desirous of such an interview, and the belief it could result in a good understanding between the states, but stated it would require tact for it to be brought about without touching the sensibility of some of the Presidents. He felt assured there would not be the slightest hesitation upon the part of the Presidents of Salvador and Nicaragua, and that he also felt assured that Leiba, who would very soon (in all probability) become the President of Honduras, would heartily concur. Mr. Williamson told him he thought he knew President Guardia well enough to feel assured that he would cheerfully consent to such an interview, and that he believed he could approach him on the subject without in any way compromising the personal or official sensibility of any one. President Barrios then insisted Mr. Williamson should make the attempt, and the latter consented, especially as he was also desirous of seeing President Guardia as to the amicable settlement of the boundary question between Nicaragua and Costa Rica. President Guardia said in reply to this he would be pleased to meet the other Presidents at a time and place to be agreed upon, and indicated as his choice of the place of meeting either San José or the city of Guatemala. The time and place of meeting could not be agreed upon for obvious reasons; but President Guardia said he was willing to meet the other presidents at any time and place that might be selected. After some further conversation on minor topics the conference closed.

This memorandum has been prepared since, in accordance with a suggestion of President Guardia that something should be written, and it is signed by all of the parties to said conference.

I recognize the correctness of the above statement as far as it relates to the interview of this day.

DEAR SIR: I was very sorry yesterday on leaving Punta Arenas to know of your indisposition, that prevented me of the pleasure of seeing you at the last moment. I hope you feel well at present. With this note you will receive another, in accord with yours and my own feelings, directed to General Rufino Barrios, President of Guatemala. Be so good, since you have been so in this and on every occasion, as to send it to the person to whom it is written. By all means you must know that I am determined to maintain the assurance of my good-will in favor of peace and progress of all the Central American states. Please to receive my personal compliments, and believe me,

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, dated on the steamer Montijo. It will afford me much pleasure to deliver to President Barrios the letter which you inclose for him. I think we fully concur in our views as to the favorable consequences that are likely to result from the proposed personal conference of the five Presidents of Central America. There is no doubt that strong personal and political influences, hostile to the existing governments, will be actively exerted to prevent the conference. You will be prepared to combat and overthrow such influences, and I shall venture upon a word of caution to the other Presidents.

Be pleased to accept, general, my thanks for the cordial terms in which you have chosen to refer to my good intentions; I but feebly represent the ardent wish of my government that Costa Rica and her sister states may be peaceful and prosperous.

I avail myself of this occasion to tender you the assurance of my distinguished consideration, and have the honor to be your obedient servant,

*Mr. Williamson to Señor Rivas.*UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
December 8, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 21st ultimo, in which you inform me of the probable sale of the American steamer Montejo to the government of Costa Rica, and that said steamer is to be used for hostile purposes against the other allied states of Central America. Your excellency also asks my intervention in this affair. There is no law of the United States which prohibits the owner of the Montejo from selling her, and I have therefore no authority to interfere. But I am glad to be able to say to you, that my information is the sale is not likely to be consummated, and if it is that the Montejo is too small and too old a craft to be useful as a vessel of war. I am also happy to congratulate your excellency on the promised disappearance of the threatening clouds of war which seemed to hang over Central America. Doubtless you have learned from the government of Guatemala that I am en route to Costa Rica in the interests of peace. I shall take pleasure in advising you of the result.

I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

SIR: I have the honor of inclosing you herewith a copy of a letter written to-day to the minister of foreign affairs of Nicaragua, to accompany the transmission to him of a copy of the memorandum of the conversation with President Guardia on the 10th instant.

I hope it may meet your approval.

*Mr. Williamson to Señor Rivas.*UNITED STATES LEGATION AT CENTRAL AMERICA, Punta Arenas, Costa Rica, December 14, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you a copy of a memorandum of a conversation held on the 10th instant at this place with President Guardia, of Costa Rica. You will observe he professed the most peaceable inclination, and promptly agreed to the suggestion of a proposed personal conference between the five Presidents. In addition to what is stated in the memorandum, but which was accidentally omitted, President Guardia declared he had nothing to do with the expeditions of the General Sherman and the Tigre, and that he had recently had the latter vessel seized in this port, because he was informed she was about to depart on a hostile errand against Nicaragua. Your excellency's government is quite as fully informed as I am in regard to the subjects of these statements, and prepared to give them the weight to which they are entitled; yet I take the liberty of adding that but little significance can be conceded, it would seem, to the contradictory depositions of the person, Ross, about the charter of the Tigre, unless they are corroborated by other evidence.

If, after due deliberation, it should seem expedient to your government to approve the plan of the personal conference of the five Presidents, can you oblige me by notifying me of the time and place indicated? You will concur with me doubtless that the personal and political enemies of the existing governments, as well as the malcontents who live upon civil disturbances, will probably exert a strong influence to prevent the conference. You will please to understand that I do not include all opponents in the above classes, for I can readily imagine how good and patriotic citizens, from lack of information, or distrust, or other causes, might oppose it. It would appear the result ought to be tranquillizing to Central America. In no event can I see how it can be detrimental to any state. The government of Costa Rica has not purchased the American steamer Montijo, but negotiations are now pending to pay her owner the damages he has incurred. He proposes to sail with her for Panama on the 17th instant.

I have, &c.,

GEO. WILLIAMSON.

Hon. A. H. RIVAS,

Minister of Foreign Affairs, Managua, Nicaragua.

P. S.—You will please pardon me for adding this postscript to say that I carry an unsealed friendly letter from President Guardia to President Barrios, in which he designates Guatemala as the place of meeting of the five Presidents.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that when the ship stopped at Amapala to-day I went ashore, and was immediately called upon by President Gonzalez and his minister of foreign affairs. The President happened to be in Amapala, because a day or two previous his troops, after a sharp skirmish, had captured the place from the forces of President Arias. We had a conversation about the proposed personal conference of the five Presidents, from which he expressed the hope the pacification of Central America would result. I handed him a Spanish copy of the memorandum of the conversation with President Guardia. He read it attentively and expressed his cordial thanks to my government for the profound interest it manifested in tranquilizing Central America. I remarked to him I was only performing an agreeable duty in conformity with what I believed to be the wish of my government; a wish, I said, not inspired by sentimental ideas, or the purpose of interfering in the affairs of the Central American states, but which sprung naturally from the pacific principles of republicanism and an honest hope that some resultant advantages might be derived by the increase of our commerce keeping pace with advancing prosperity of our neighbors.

He told me all the principal towns and leading men of Honduras had declared in favor of Leiva, and that Arias was fortified in Comayagua with some troops of whom General Straeber (of Omoa fame) was the commander. He also stated he hoped Arias would abandon the presidency without further bloodshed.

Such being the condition of affairs in Honduras, I again abandoned my trip to Comayagua, which I trust will meet your approbation.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you copies of my correspondence with the minister of foreign affairs of this government in regard to the prevention of war in these states. A letter verbatim et literatim, like the one addressed to me, was also addressed to Her Britannic Majesty's minister, Mr. Edwin Corbett, who accompanied me to Costa Rica. After President Guardia had expressed his desire for peace, both of us showed him our letters.

You will observe no mention of the subject of the personal conference of the five Presidents is made in the letters of the minister of foreign affairs. That was owing to the fact that it was thought such a written expression would be unbecoming the dignity of the government of Guatemala; and as the letters referred to were intended to be exhibited in Costa Rica, it was omitted.

GUATEMALA, December 1, 1873.

SIR: It has just come to the knowledge of my government that in the republic of Costa Rica a rumor prevails to the effect that Guatemala is making considerable military preparations for the purpose of carrying war into that country, and blockading her ports on both oceans. By the correspondence which arrived to-day my government is also informed that President Guardia, by a decree issued on the 20th of November, resigned the supreme power into the hands of Señor Don Salvador Gonzalez, reserving to himself the chief command of the army. For these reasons, and particularly because Señor Gonzalez is now at the head of the government of Costa Rica, I have received instructions from his excellency, the President, to address your excellency, who has showed so great a desire to preserve inviolable the peace of Central America, assuring you that on the part of the government of Guatemala there does not exist the most distant intention of making war upon Costa Rica, but that on the contrary, it ardently desires to maintain with all of the sister republics the most intimate and cordial relations.

My government hopes that President Gonzalez may be animated by similar wishes and sentiments, and fully expects that he will manifest them opportunely. But in the mean time the president, taking advantage of your excellency's intended journey to Costa Rica, commissions me to beg your excellency to deign to inform Señor Gonzalez, and all persons with whom your excellency may speak, that the government of Guatemala desires to remain in perfect peace and amity with the republic of Costa Rica, as well as with the rest of Central America. The kindness with which your excellency interests yourself in all that tends to promote the great interests of these countries, among which their internal and external tranquillity must occupy the first place, makes me hope that your excellency will accede willingly to the wishes of my government; and offering you in anticipation the most sincere thanks for your good offices in this respect, I am happy to subscribe myself,

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your excellency's note of the first instant, handed me on the eve of my departure for Costa Rica. Inclosed your excellency will find a copy of a memorandum of a conversation on the 10th instant, at Punta Arenas, with President Guardia, an open letter from President Guardia to President Barrios, and a sealed letter from Mr. Edward Corbett, Her Britannic Majesty's minister, which he read to me before sealing. These papers will inform your excellency's government of the strongly expressed desire of the president of Costa Rica for peace in Central America, and also of his approval of the proposed personal conference of the five Presidents. I hope all the good results may follow the conference that reasonably may be expected, and redound to the honor of the Presidents of Guatemala and Salvador who inaugurated this seemingly happy plan of settling the differences among the states and their chief magistrates. I also beg to inform your excellency that, on my return voyage from Costa Rica, I sent a copy of the inclosed memorandum to the President of Nicaragua, and handed one to President Gonzalez, whom I had the good fortune to meet at Amapala.

Renewing to your excellency the assurance of my high consideration, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

SIR: Your dispatch No. 61, of the 27th ultimo, has been received.

Although some of the purposes for the proposed meeting of the Presidents of the Central American republics, adverted to in your conversation with President Barrios, of which you give an account, may be regarded as desirable and probably attainable, others, from our point of view at least, would not be deemed desirable, if attainable. This opinion is especially applicable to the restraints proposed in one state upon persons charged with or even suspected of revolutionary designs upon another.

It is hoped that in your dealings with the politicians in that quarter, particularly when it is borne in mind how frequently they and their schemes are changed, you will be careful to avoid committing yourself so that your usefulness in any event or the friendly disposition toward this Government might not be weakened.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you a translated copy of decree issued by the President of this state on the 15th instant in regard to the construction of certain high-roads, among them the important one to Yzabal on the Gulf of Dulce. I have had repeated conversations with the President and his cabinet in regard to this road, and they have reiterated their determination to build it. If this is done and proper facilities at a competing rate are furnished from Yzabal to our ports, I believe a large portion of the trade of Guatemala, some from Salvador, and a great deal from the departments of Gracias and Santa Barbara, in Honduras, will seek markets in the United States instead of, as now, in Europe.

Decree of the President of Guatemala.

ARTICLE 1. The opening of a high road which, beginning at Guatemala, shall terminate at Yzabal, and the opening of branch roads which shall unite with it the departments of Chiquimula, Jalapo, and Verapaz, adopting for this purpose the design made by the engineer, Mr. Wray, with the modifications proposed in the plans and designs last made.

ART. 2. The opening of another high road which, leaving Hubuetenango, or rather the mines of Chiantla, shall terminate in Champerico, passing through and uniting the principal populations of the departments of the west.

ART. 3. The continuation of the high road, already far advanced, which leads to the frontier of Salvador, thereby giving full effect to the Arbizu-Samayoa treaty.

ART. 4. The imposition of a tax, which shall be called the "territorial tax," of a cuartillo real, ($6\frac{1}{2}$ cents;) a manzana, (100 yards by 100 yards;) or it may be two dollars a caballeria ($33\frac{1}{3}$ acres) of land.

ART. 5. That said tax shall go into effect on the first of January of the coming year, shall be paid within the space of the three succeeding months, and by all owners or holders of lands, with the exception of such lands as may hold the rights and immunities of cities; this exception not to be enjoyed by the owners of municipal lands from whom the direct or profitable ownership should have been withdrawn.

ART. 6. That the chancellor of the exchequer shall frame and present the law which shall fix the manner and requisite conditions for the making of registrations and the collection of taxes, and also the fixing of penalties in order to render effective the present decree.

ART. 7. That the minister of improvements, for his part, charge himself with the execution of that which was ordained in the 1st, 2d and 3d articles, preparing the tools and necessary materials, so as to commence the opening of the roads as soon as the funds destined for them shall begin to be collected.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the dispatch of your excellency of the 8th instant.

I thank your excellency for the attention paid to all my communications, and for your congratulations upon the prospects of peace between Nicaragua and Costa Rica. My government receives it as a happy omen that we may come to that issue through the interposition of your excellency's good offices.

My government sincerely applauds the good inclinations of your excellency in that direction, and has instructed me especially to express its gratitude for your tender of good offices in the settlement of the boundary question with Costa Rica. Your excellency may be assured upon that point there will be found on the part of Nicaragua all the acquiescence compatible with the dignity of the state, in order that a conclusion of this vexatious question may be reached. Up to this time no communication has been received from the cabinet of Guatemala relative to the projected meeting of the five Presidents of Central America, with the view of establishing among them friendly relations. This idea having been discussed, as your excellency informs me, by the Presidents of Salvador and Guatemala, the government of Nicaragua will not throw any obstruction in the way of the realization of so important an end. But I must say frankly, it will take part in it without much hope (or faith) in the result, for the reason it does not see what guarantee President Guardia and his minister, Herrera, can give for the fulfillment of what may be agreed upon at the conference. Nevertheless the question of peace to those states is so vital (as your excellency has well said) that no means must be spared to establish it.

I have the honor to renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

Yours, &c.,

A. H. RIVAS.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 90.—Translation.]

Señor Rivas to Mr. Williamson.

NATIONAL PALACE, OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Managua, December 20, 1873.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's esteemed communication, dated at Punta Arenas, on the 14th instant, inclosing a copy of the memorandum of the conversation held with President Guardia on the 10th instant, at that port.

I brought to the knowledge of the President your excellency's esteemed dispatch, and of the memorandum, from which, as well as from some other documents received at the same time, he infers, as your excellency, that President Guardia has at last come to a peaceful disposition.

As I stated to your excellency in my dispatch of the 12th instant, neither the government of Guatemala nor that of Salvador has advised this government of their disposition to promote a peaceful settlement with President Guardia, nor have they informed us of what steps they proposed, through your excellency, to take to that end.

I call your excellency's notice to this circumstance, because my government does not consider it in conformity to the letter and spirit of the treaty of alliance by which they agreed as allied republics to take no steps without common consent that would lead to the best guarantees of their interests and welfare. But this circumstance alters not in any manner the disposition already assured to your excellency, that on the part of Nicaragua no obstacle will be put in the way of carrying out any idea that may tend to the re-establishment of peace and harmony among the states, especially if the valuable intervention of your good office may be invoked.

Nicaragua being able to show with authentic documents the culpability of the government of Costa Rica in the acts subversive of peace, is in duty bound to raise to that government its just claims for serious damages to the state and to several citizens; but neither these claims, nor the question of limits for the settlement of which your excellency has tendered your good offices, shall be an obstacle to Nicaragua in entering upon any treaty or convention to secure the peace of Central America.

In reference to this idea of permanent peace, in which your excellency has taken so great and so laudable an interest, the President begs me to call it to your notice that the statements and assurances of President Guardia, made in the convention of the 10th instant, have not yet had the sanction of the actual government of Costa Rica. It would appear any efforts made should have such a firm basis of legality that the acts resulting therefrom should be permanent. In this Nicaragua is more interested than any of the states, owing to her proximity to Costa Rica and the nature of the question now pending between them.

Respecting the personal presence of the President of this republic at the place to be designated for the re-union, there is a constitutional obstacle. He has been authorized by the law, of which I send you a copy, to leave the republic solely with the object of treating about the national unity and not about regulations of peace among the states. However, your excellency may rest assured that the government of Nicaragua shall be properly represented at the meeting.

With the highest consideration, I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

A. H. RIVAS.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you herewith a translated copy of an article on the "general situation" in Central America, published in the "Porvenir," of Nicaragua, in its issue of the 21st instant. The statements contained therein are so correct, according to my information, that I venture to send it to you, only remarking that I am credibly informed the proffered intervention of Nicaragua alluded to therein was rejected by President Arias.

He demanded the troops of Guatemala and Salvador should be withdrawn from the soil of Honduras. At last accounts they were preparing to move on his intrenchments in Comayagua. His force is reputed at six hundred; that of his opponents at twenty-five hundred.

General Situation.

[Article in the "Porvenir," of Nicaragua, of the 21st December, 1873.—Translation.]

The affairs of Central America are getting so complicated that it is very difficult to foresee how they will end, and they are creating such confusion in the ideas of the different political parties that for some time past have been struggling to establish the predominance of their respective principles, that we believe, without fear of error in our calculation, that they will all, before long, be completely at a loss as to the best course of conduct to be followed in order to secure the objects of their aspirations.

Or perhaps this very confusion of ideas, this fruitless and constant struggle of parties which destroys to-day at the cost of great sacrifices the work done yesterday with equally great efforts, may at last cause in the minds of the people of Central America the belief that principles are not discussed, and that the object of this party strife is not the triumph of this or that idea, but that all the issues at stake are questions of interest and personal advantage. If the people become convinced of this the result will be beneficial, as they will not then listen to the call to fight under this or that banner, knowing that obedience to such a call will not be for their advantage, but only to procure to such and such persons the satisfaction of riding over them.

The present state of the affairs of the sister republic suggests these reflections. In that of Costa Rica Señor Guardia continues to perform his farce of self-denial and patriotism, of love and peace, and of zeal for the national interests.

On the 30th of November last he addressed to his excellency the first designado, then in the exercise of the executive power, a letter which was published in the Official Gazette, No. 55, of the 6th instant, in which he stated that grave motives of public policy obliged him to return to the presidency; that nobody had believed in the good faith with which he had laid down the same for the sake of peace and tranquillity; the different parties having thought it a brilliant opportunity to grasp power, and thus gratify personal ambition; that though not in the exercise of power, he could not forget that he was the true president of the republic, and responsible to the nation if, unfortunately, it should be plunged into anarchy; that, as a principal cause of distrust, the belief was alleged that Gonzalez was an accomplice in the bad management of Guardia, and that this fear, whether founded or unfounded, obliged him to put himself again at the head of the administration, although it might be but during the re-establishment of tranquillity and confidence, thus putting a stop to those party struggles.

Mr. Guardia ended his letter by thanking Mr. Gonzalez for his self-abnegation and patriotism in coming to that post when called to do so; he acknowledged the upright intentions with which he (Gonzalez) had tried to reconcile the interest of all for the public good, and signed himself his obedient servant.

Mr. Guardia's conviction of the necessity of peremptorily removing Mr. Gonzalez before he should compromise, through the policy already inaugurated by him, the future well-being of the republic, is clearly seen in this letter.

However, after having again assumed power on the 1st instant, by a simple decree of the first designado, in which, without any considerations at all, he declares Guardia in possession of the supreme command of the republic, and having accepted the resignation of their respective portfolios, which was tendered by Don Rafael Ramirez and Dr. José M. Castro, he appointed successors to those gentlemen. On the 2d he summoned the second designado, Don Rafael Barroeta, uncle of Mrs. Guardia, alleging that it was not necessary to prolong his continuance in power in view of his desire to return to private life, and adding that Mr. Gonzalez had declared that he could not remain in office. All this is a badly played comedy, because in the very documents published the facts can be seen.

In spite of the great confusion which reigns in these affairs, it can clearly be perceived that in the administration of Costa Rica a sentiment of peace prevails, and it cannot be otherwise, after the failure of Mr. Guardia in all his attempts to disturb the peace of Central America and to obtain a decisive influence in its affairs.

On the other hand it appears that the idea of establishing peace in all the states was a result of the conference held at Chingo. Mr. Guardia has received an invitation to meet with the other presidents of Central America and put an end to the indefinite provisional presidency of Mr. Arias in Honduras, whose government, in the opinion of many persons, is an obstacle to the realization of that idea on account of its excessive rigidity.

It seems very likely that this invitation will be accepted by Mr. Guardia, as it is really to his interest to re-establish friendly relations with the other governments in order to strengthen his rule in Costa Rica. What will our government do in such a case? Will Mr. Quadra, with his good faith and candor of past times, again set out on a fatiguing journey to hear protestations and promises that, for him, have no value whatever? We shall see; but in the mean time let us be permitted to doubt.

In regard to the Honduras question, we believe it has attained proportions not foreseen at Chingo. The discredit into which Arias has fallen is well known, and it seemed very natural to suppose that when a more popular citizen was proclaimed President, under the protection of the allies of Honduras, the whole country would also proclaim such citizen. It seems, however, that some error was committed in the modus operandi by which the national susceptibility was awakened, and that Mr. Arias is now in possession of much more power than before.

Still the proclamation of Mr. Leiva has continued its course, he having organized his government at Tegucigalpa on the 8th instant, his cabinet being composed of Messrs. Adolfo Zuniga, Trinidad Ferrari, and General Juan Lopez, who represent the three political parties, viz, radical liberal, moderate, and conservative liberal.

The faction of Finoco proclaimed Mr. Leiva, offering him their respect and love, and protesting that in entering the territory of Honduras they had no object save the overthrow of their country's tyrant.

In the mean time Marshal Gonzalez had collected a considerable number of troops, with artillery and a flotilla, at La Union, with the object of attacking the port of Amapala. Commander Vargas and his garrison behaved like true soldiers, rejecting every summons made them to surrender. Notwithstanding the inferiority of their force, they declared their determination to fight if they were attacked. On the 13th instant, at 3 p. m., the attack against the port began.

The small Honduran garrison made a vigorous resistance, but, after a long and bloody conflict, was forced to yield to superior numbers. Forty Salvadorians and seven Amapalians were killed, while many were wounded on both sides. Marshal Gonzalez directed the attack and General Samayoa was chief of the operations. Soon after the port was taken Marshal Gonzalez landed and took possession of it. The commandant and the garrison of the port were held as prisoners.

Hostilities were thus commenced between the Salvadorians and Hondurans, who have so often fought side by side in defense of the same cause.

The government of Nicaragua, however, offered its intervention in favor of peace, but, as is always the case, seems to have arrived too late to prevent the shedding of Central American blood. This was unavoidable, no manifestations or declarations having been made beforehand to make known such a state of things to the neighboring governments, so that, when this was least expected, the belligerents met with arms ready for battle.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit you herewith a translated copy of the pronunciamiento or decree of Señor Leiva, in which he assumed the provisional government of Honduras on the 23d of November last. It has been impossible for me to get a copy at an earlier date.

The serious charges it contains against President Arias are corroborated from many quarters, and particularly by Consul C. R. Föllin, of Omoa and Truxillo. Like most Spanish-American documents of its kind, its enunciation of principles is worthy of commendation. If Señor Leiva, when installed in power, (as he intimates indirectly in paragraph sixth he will,) gives freedom to the press in Honduras, it will be a step far in advance of any of his cotemporary Presidents in Central America.

Decree of Señor Leiva.

Ponciano Leiva, citizen of the republic of Honduras, having been called to the presidency of this country by public opinion, expressed in various ways—

Considering the notorious unpopularity and discredit into which the administration of Mr. Arias has fallen ;

That during the eighteen months of his government he has proved himself incapable of maintaining order in the interior or of repelling aggression from abroad, as recent facts have shown, and as is well known to all Central America ;

That Mr. Arias, turning his back to the noble and generous principles proclaimed by the past revolution, has established a government which is purely personal and arbitrary ;

That the government of Mr. Arias has maintained the dictatorship longer than was necessary, without any reason of public good, and only with the object of imposing his election upon the people ;

That he has suppressed all liberty, keeping the press muzzled, and restricting the right of suffrage, which are the basis of all republican governments ;

That the most sacred civil rights, which existed prior to and are above all legislation, have been violated in all the departments of the republic by order of the government of Mr. Arias, or with his consent ;

That the military executions, proscriptions, and arbitrary imprisonments, accompanied by the most inhuman acts, confiscation in all its forms, have been exercised on a large scale in the republic, all in the name of democracy and liberty ;

That the anarchy into which Honduras is sunk is the logical consequence of his errors and arbitrary management ;

That it is absolutely necessary to put a stop to so abnormal and violent a state of things, to enable the people to enjoy peace, order, and true liberty ;

That public feeling and opinion generally manifest the necessity of a change of administration ;

By the right of insurrection, proclaimed and sanctioned by all the enlightened nations of Europe and America, declares—

1st. A new provisional government is inaugurated in the republic of Honduras.

2d. In the mean time, until the cabinet is fully organized, I appoint temporarily to take charge of the departments of foreign relations, government, justice, public instruction, improvement, and ecclesiastical affairs, the Licenciado Don Adolfo Zuniga, and for those of war and finance, Lieutenant-General Juan Lopez.

3d. The new government will proceed to the organization of all the branches of the public service immediately.

No. 94.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, January 14, 1874. (Received February 5.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that in an interview with the minister of war of this state to-day he exhibited to me what purported to be duplicate copies of the demands made by the commanding officers of the forces of Guatemala, Salvador, and of Señor Leiva's provisional government upon President Arias for the surrender of Comayagua and his vacation of the presidency.

The demands are joint. They are quite temperate in language, and allow President Arias three days to reply. They bear date 3d January, 1874. If, at the expiration of the three days granted, President Arias does not comply, he is notified the responsibility of the consequences must be borne by him and his confederates. The commanding officers state to President Arias they know his actual force, and that it is daily diminishing by desertions, while their own is six times his in point of numbers, with complete equipments and munitions. They profess to wish to avoid a useless destruction of life and property in so unequal a contest.

In an official letter from General Solares, commanding the troops of Guatemala, which was also shown me, he states the plan of operation of the allies if President Arias refuses, and maintains he has reliable information Arias has but four hundred men. He adds, that he has reason to believe a large part of those will desert as soon as the fight begins. He expresses the expectation that Comayagua and the President may be captured without much loss of life or property.

I ventured to ask the minister whether he thought President Arias would yield to the demands. He said he was an obstinate man, and that Central American Presidents held on to their offices, as a general rule, until they were shot or banished.

In a few days intelligence ought to reach here of the result of the above-mentioned proceedings. I shall communicate it as soon as received.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the government of President Arias has been overthrown, and he is now a prisoner.

The attack upon Comayagua was made on the 8th instant. After five days' desultory skirmishing President Arias surrendered himself and his small garrison of about three hundred men to the commanding officer of the forces of Guatemala, Salvador, and of the provisional government of Señor Leiva. Ex-President Medina was liberated from the prison in which he has been kept in close confinement by President Arias for nearly two years.

The government of Leiva has no opposition now, and as it is the only one of any kind in Honduras, I propose to avail myself of the opportunity to present my letter of credence.

I hope this action may not be considered hasty, and may meet your approval.

My route will be via Omoa and Puerto Cabello, and thence across the state of Honduras to Comayagua. In order to obtain transportation it will be necessary for me to go to Belize, as there are no boats, except open dories or bungaloes, plying between this point and the ports of Honduras. Making due allowance for the necessary detentions, I cannot hope to be back in Guatemala before the 1st of March.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, upon my arrival here yesterday evening, I met with a dispatch from Mr. Charles R. Follin, our consul, now residing at San Pedro, in Honduras, which fully confirms the intelligence communicated to you in my No. 99. The English vice-consul at Omoa, Mr. De Broot, also stated to me to-day the contents of a letter he had received within the last few days from General Solares, commanding the forces of Guatemala in the capture of Comayagua, in which that general details the result of the five days' skirmishing, and mentions, in addition to the other facts stated in my No. 99, that General Straeber, of "Omoa" fame, was mortally wounded. General Straeber commanded the troops of President Arias, reduced at the time of the surrender, by desertions and casualties, to about two hundred men.

I expect to leave here on the 29th instant for Omoa.

SIR: I have now the honor to inclose you a copy of the demand for satisfaction for outrages at Omoa in July last, made in accordance with your instructions, (the number of which I am not able to give on account of absence from my office,) and of the reply of the government of Honduras. The conversation referred to in the last paragraph of my letter to the minister was held with President Leiva, in the presence of his cabinet, just after my official reception. In that conversation he and his cabinet expressed the most profound regret for the occurrences complained of, and asked what would be satisfactory to my Government. I replied it was impossible for me to say at that moment, but that, although the outrage was so grave a one it might have become a "casus belli," and resulted in consequences more serious to Honduras than the bombardment of the Fortress of Omoa, I was prepared to believe my Government, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, might be satisfied with an apology, a salute of twenty-one guns to the consular flag from the fort when it was again raised at Omoa, and a decree forever prohibiting the officer commanding the forces at the time of the outrage from ever again holding a military or civil office of profit, trust, or honor in the republic of Honduras. I understood all of them to concur in the expression of the view that such a satisfaction as I indicated would be readily conceded. The President asked time to investigate the facts, and informed me that he had men under arrest and in the way to Comayagua, the judge of the first instance and sixteen citizens of Omoa, who were reputed to have been the leaders in the numerous outrages alleged to have been committed. General Straeber, he said, had escaped into Salvador, but he proposed to make a requisition for him and bring him to trial.

I beg to be further instructed what to do in regard to this matter.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Comayagua, February 19, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to state that on or about the 10th of July last the flag of the United States, then flying over the office of Consul Charles R. Follin, at Omoa, was hauled down by a mob of soldiers and citizens of Honduras, and treated with marks of disrespect; and that at or about the same time the same mob violated the sanctity of the said consular office and property at Omoa, by breaking into the office, destroying and mutilating some of the property, and exposing the correspondence of the said consulate of the United States to public inspection. All these acts were in violation of international law and of the subsisting treaty between my country and Honduras. At the date of these unhappy occurrences Señor Arias was acting as provisional President of Honduras, and General Straeber, who commanded the forces at Omoa, was his appointee; but as it was impossible to open diplomatic relations with the government of Señor Arias, and his excellency President Leiva has succeeded to the executive office of the republic, it becomes my duty to address myself to him for redress.

Under instructions from my Government, I therefore have the honor to ask that full and prompt satisfaction be rendered for said outrage upon the flag of the United States and violation of the property of the consulate at Omoa. Referring your excellency to my conversation with his excellency the President to-day, in the presence of yourself and other members of his cabinet, on this subject, I beg to express the hope his government will find no difficulty in acceding with promptness to this just demand of my Government, and that no interruption may occur in the friendly relations which have so long happily subsisted between our countries.

With the assurance of my high consideration, I remain, &c.

OFFICE OF MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Comayagua, February 19, 1874.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I had the honor to receive your excellency's official dispatch of this date, in which you make known to this government that, about the 10th of July of the year just passed, citizens of Honduras and soldiers belonging to the forces under the command of General Richard Straeber, at Omoa, broke into the office of the United States consul, Don Charles R. Follin, sacking the archives of the consulate, and scattering and destroying some of the papers, and that on account of these acts your excellency expected the government of Honduras to give prompt and complete satisfaction to the Government of the United States.

The citizen President, before whom I have laid your excellency's dispatch, instructs me to inform your excellency that the government of Honduras deplores these events; that, led by the public rumor of their having occurred, he has given orders for the reconstruction of the judiciary at Omoa, and for a rigid inquiry to be instituted in regard to the acts that are the foundation of the reclamation of your excellency. If they are found to have been done, then the government of Honduras will have no difficulty in doing justice to the Government of the United States, according to the laws of nations. Perhaps the fact of the overthrow of the government of Señor Arias, under whose orders General Straeber acted, is one of the best satisfactions which the government and people of Honduras may have been able to give to the Government of the United States.

I hold it a great honor, Señor Minister, to offer myself as your attentive and obedient servant,

ADOLFO ZUNIGA.

SIR: I have now completed my journey from Omoa through the most populous portions of Honduras, and it seems proper that I should have the honor of giving you the result of my observations in regard to the probable permanency of the newly-established government of President Leiva.

He seems to be very much beloved and esteemed along my whole line of travel, and is reputed to be equally so in other parts of the country. Foreigners and natives alike spoke in terms of high praise of his intelligence and disinterested patriotism. They expressed no doubt that he was and is the popular choice of Honduras. The condemnations of the usurpations and tyrannies of Arias were unmeasured and universal. Leiva holds his office by the same terms that Arias did, both being provisional Presidents, or, as they would probably be called in our country, revolutionary Presidents. They are both civilians, without any military prestige, and before the usurpations of Arias, he was thought to be as free from ambition as Leiva now is. He was never a popular man, I am told. It is idle to speculate upon what effect may be produced upon Leiva by the exercise of power, or upon what changes of policy may result from a more practical knowledge of the peculiar characteristics of his people; but I am somewhat hopeful he may be able to adhere to his republican ideas, and afford to Honduras a stable and good government. He has made the impression upon me, at least for the present, that he is a man of firm character and fixed principles, and likely to be subject to the mutations that seem to come over the rulers of these countries when they find themselves well installed in office.

My dispatches heretofore have contained so much about this gentleman that I will not trouble you with more, save only to say he treated me with distinguished courtesy during my stay at his capital, and gave me a handsome official banquet on the day of my reception. His cabinet was present. In reply to the toasts to the President and his representative present, I took occasion to repeat as briefly as possible the sentiments expressed by you in your report to the Senate, which I quoted in my address in Salvador, and in a dispatch of Mr. Seward, dated October 28, 1862, written in reply to a request from the government of Guatemala to take the advice of President Lincoln in regard to certain "projected organic changes in the governments of Guatemala and other Central American republics."

I hope to arrive at Guatemala by the 2d or 3d of March. The upward-bound steamer is due here to-day.

SIR: Inclosed I have the honor to send you copies of correspondence with the government of Nicaragua. Allow me to invite your special attention to my reply, and also to the dispatch of the late Hon. W. H. Seward, to which it refers. It is dated October 28, 1862, and is addressed to Mr. E. O. Crosby, the minister to Guatemala. I am thus particular in describing this statesmanlike paper, because I have not seen it published among the public documents.

The translated copy of Mr. Rivas's dispatch of 20th of December, of which he inclosed me a duplicate-original in his of the 10th of February, was sent you with my No. 89.

Señor Rivas to Mr. Williamson.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Monagua, February 10, 1874.

SIR: As, since your return from Costa Rica, I have not had the pleasure of receiving any of your esteemed favors, I do myself the honor of accompanying this with my duplicate dispatch of the 20th December last.

The situation of Nicaragua in respect to Costa Rica is pacific, that government having ceased all its acts of hostility, but the diplomatic relations have not been renewed, although this office has made an overture with that view to the government at San José.

The equal silence which prevails on the part of Guatemala and Salvador is readily explained by their occupations with the questions of Honduras, and on account of the presence at the capitals of these republics of the minister plenipotentiary from this government, I place these matters specially before the notice of your excellency, because the interest you have manifested in having a general and permanent peace established in Central America entitles you to these minute details of the relations between the governments.

Just now it has become privately known that Dr. Lorenzo Montufar has started, or is about to start, on a mission from Costa Rica to the governments of Guatemala and Salvador. It is generally believed to be a pacific mission, but the coolness existing between this government and that of Costa Rica, and, perhaps, a suspicion of a secret enmity on the part of the latter, does not allow us to feel secure that it is altogether with the end of promoting peace and harmony.

Being well assured of your excellency's impartiality and correct judgment and noble anxiety for the tranquillity of these states, I lay before you the situation, so that you may be able to examine into these things, in order to give effect to the laudable desire that has always inspired you. I improve the opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of the high respect and consideration with which I subscribe myself,

Your true and attentive servant,

A. H. RIVAS.

Hon. Señor DON GEORGE WILLIAMSON,

Minister of the United States in Central America, Guatemala.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 114.]

Mr. Williamson to Señor Rivas.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,

Guatemala, March 16, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's esteemed favor of the 10th ultimo.

Let me first assure you that a want of a reply to your favor of the 20th of December has been caused by my long absence in Honduras on official business; and the delay of one mail in answering that of the 10th of February is due to the fact that since my return, on the 3d instant, I have found the fatigue and exposure I had undergone had so affected my health, and particularly my eyes, that it was almost impossible to attend to my correspondence. I shall hope your excellency will be pleased to accept this apology.

Notwithstanding the flattering terms in which you have chosen to speak of the interest I have taken in the pacification of Central America, upon a basis that promised permanency, you do nothing more than simple justice to me and my Government in your estimate of its degree. But your excellency justly understands that the states, being sovereigns, and under able administrations, are capable of managing their own relations far better than any foreign country, no matter how friendly that country may be; and also, that I might defeat the very honorable object of my Government, of promoting the pacific settlement of all debatable questions in Central America by taking a more active part than has already been done, or by prosecuting that part further at present.

If what seemed to me, a stranger, a desirable mode of adjusting complications between the states is defeated, or declined for any cause, it affords me no occasion for complaint, nor will it in the least abate the concern with which I shall regard future developments. It may prove a consolatory reflection, should any disappointment be experienced, that I did not inaugurate the plan, and possibly it may be allowable for me to flatter myself by a recollection of the fact that all active preparations for war ceased, on both sides, so soon after it seemed probable the re-union of the Presidents would take place.

Whatever merit attaches to my participation in producing this happy truce, or peace, is but another evidence of the sincere friendship of my Government for Nicaragua. As the representative of my country in these states, my mission is to promote a good understanding, as far as it is allowable, without giving cause of offense or involving my Government in a voluntary responsibility, which it does not pertain to its functions to assume.

The experience of your excellency renders it almost needless to say that the sympathetic interest the United States has always taken in the republics of Central America has not been inspired by sentimental ideas, but is rather the natural outgrowth of near neighborhood, and of a generous desire that other independent states on the continent may enjoy the blessings of republicanism a good Providence has so bountifully bestowed on them. I submit, for your excellency's perusal, the accompanying copy of a dispatch from Mr. Seward, when Secretary of State, and take leave to add, that distinguished statesman, in this eloquent paper, suggests a policy of the United States in regard to the affairs of Central America which seems to be based upon a philosophy so sound, that I do not question it will commend itself to your unqualified approval.

Your excellency will allow me to express my profound regret that diplomatic relations had not been resumed between Nicaragua and Costa Rica at the date of your letter, and also the hope that they will be happily established before this reaches you.

In reply to that part of your excellency's letter in regard to the mission of Mr. Montufar, I have only to say that he is reported generally to be here on a confidential mission from the government of Costa Rica. He has had no official reception, and he has not been officially recognized here, up to this time, by the diplomatic body. I have had the pleasure of seeing him several times socially, but have no information as to his mission, if it be of a political nature.

By this mail I send, to the care of your excellency, four volumes, entitled "Papers relating to the treaty of Washington," which you will oblige me by causing to be delivered, with my compliments, to the Hon. Tomas Ayon, the recent minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of your government to Guatemala, whose pleasant acquaintance I had the good fortune to make. I have the honor to renew to your excellency the assurance of my high consideration.

Your obedient servant,

GEO. WILLIAMSON.

Minister of Foreign Affairs, Managua, Nicaragua.

No. 31.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, October 28, 1862.

SIR: Your very interesting dispatch of the 21st of September, No. 22, has been submitted to the President. He is profoundly affected by the consideration which is manifested toward this Government by His Excellency the President of Guatemala in his proposal to confer with it concerning projected organic changes in the governments of Guatemala and other Central American Republics. Whether the natural positions of these states, their respective material resources, their natural and artificial channels and highways, and the interests, sentiments, habits, aspirations, and sympathies of their various populations favor at the present time an intimate political and mutually defensive union, are questions upon which it would be presumptuous for foreign statesmen to pronounce. The inquiry about the proper government for any country is not always what is theoretically the best possible political system which has hitherto been devised among men, but what is the best political system which the people of the country will peacefully accept and confidently maintain. How to choose this best possible political system is a question upon which foreign advice is not only naturally but even justly and wisely suspected. Jealousy upon that subject is the chief foundation of national independence. The President regards the agitation of the question of a re-union of the Central American Republics with favor, not, however, because he is prepared to say that the measure is practicable or expedient, but simply because it indicates a conviction that there are some common evils existing in the several states of Central America which are constantly reproducing civil and international wars, and a will and a purpose on the part of American statesmen there to correct them. The United States are too earnestly desirous for that correction to embarrass the parties concerned with advice which any class of the people of Central America, or any foreign state, might injuriously represent as proceeding from other than the most disinterested motives. Whatever may be the decision at which the consulting parties may arrive, it will be respected by the United States as wise and judicious, and they will remain equally the friends of the Central American powers, whether they re-unite or prefer to remain distinct and independent.

You may read this dispatch to the minister for foreign affairs, and give him a copy if he shall desire it.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you the government of Guatemala has recently issued two decrees in regard to the religious orders of the country.

One decree has for its object the abolition of all convents and monasteries and the confiscation of the property; the other prohibits the priests from wearing their clerical dress in the streets.

Both decrees have been executed with military promptness and rigor. The nuns are now guests in the houses of their friends. Among them is an American lady, the prioress of the convent of St. Teresa, to whom I have offered the hospitalities of the legation.

SIR: I have the honor to report that reliable information has reached me of a recent attempt to overthrow the government of President Guardia of Costa Rica.

It seems to have been the renewal of a plan, formed during the ten days' administration of Gonzalez, in the latter part of November last. At that time it was frustrated by Guardia's suddenly re-assuming the executive power and gratifying some of the disaffected army officers by promotions.

The failure lately is attributed to the indiscretion or infidelity of one of the revolutionists. Whatever the cause, it is quite certain Guardia had sufficient notice to arrest the chief movers. The leading man, when called before the President and interrogated, "Who are your confederates?" is said to have replied, "All the honest people of Costa Rica."

I happen to know this unfortunate gentleman. He is a merchant by profession, and a man of large fortune, which he has used so advantageously in travel that I found him one of the best-informed men I have met with in Central America. His name is Joaquin Fernandez. He has never been in political life, and is believed to be without aspirations.

It is said he assumed the organization of the revolution with the view of ridding Costa Rica of Guardia and his followers, and for the purpose of placing in the presidential chair Ex-President Castro.

Doubtless he will be shot. My information is that San José, Cartago, Heredia, and Alajuela were all ripe for revolt against Guardia when the infidelity or indiscretion before mentioned occurred. The towns named embrace in their limits and vicinity almost one-half the population of Costa Rica. * * * * *

Should there be a revolution, would it not be advisable for me not to recognize the new government until after a popular election? Guardia was elected, or passed through the forms of an election, and is therefore a constitutional officer. In this he differed from Arias of Honduras, who was not elected, but was acting provisionally, or, in our language, by revolutionary right.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you a translated copy of an address recently issued by President Gonzalez to the people of Central America.

It is not as well translated as I should have wished, but about as well done as was possible with such a document.

In it the President gives what I understand to be a correct history of the faithlessness of Señor Arias, and the elevation of President Leiva to the Presidency of Honduras.

Those passages that are most important I have marked in the margin, but I beg to call your attention to the remarks on the identity of Central American interests, to be found on pages 22, 23, 24, and 25. You will notice on page 28 he charges President Guardia, of Costa Rica, with being the protector of the Palacios expedition.

It is altogether so remarkable a document that it seemed to be my duty to send it to you.

[Inclosure.—Translation.]

Address of President Gonzalez, of Salvador.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: In the presence of the grave events which have transpired in the republic of Honduras, I ought not to persist in absolute silence.

A soldier of the republican cause, a citizen of a democratic country, and the magistrate of a free people, I fulfill at this time the pleasing task of speaking with my natural frankness, for the purpose of making perfectly clear the policy of the government over which I preside, as far as it has relation to the liberty and peace of Central America.

Under existing circumstances, and recognizing the supremacy of the rights of the people, I do not fear to express the ideas and sentiments with which I am inspired, deciding me to act as the first responsible functionary of my country.

I do not fear to tell the direction which I give to her institutions, and the projects which I entertain with the expectation that they may be realities of the future, for though I respect I do not dread the judgment of my cotemporaries, and I await with confidence the decision of posterity, which knows how to do justice to the conduct of public men.

These convictions strengthen me to explain to the inhabitants of Salvador, to other Central Americans, and to the men of every clime who may give us their attention, why and for what purpose the sovereign power of this republic, symbolized by her flag and by her arms, has been in action on the fields of Honduras. What has just occurred there is a necessary consequence of antecedents which I am now going to recall in order to present in full light a situation which those who have not been able to penetrate its depth behold as gloomy, and which they who wish to obscure the truth (which shines in deeds, in order to dazzle its adversaries) represent as gloomy and sad, with the view of making execrable the objects of their venom, to open slowly a subterranean road to re-action. Placed here in Salvador, in the difficult position of an armed representative of a revolution which, since 1871, has been reproducing the opinions and inclinations, the promises and hopes, which animated the founders of the independence of the republic, I have not been able to regard as a fallacious illusion, as a beautiful chimera, as a seductive falsehood, the programme of the patriots who pronounce the word "liberty" in order to fashion a labarum, under whose folds should rise the nations which lie in immobility and in silence under the load of slavery. From the bottom of my heart I have always rendered ardent veneration to human rights, and the grand beings who have consecrated it by heroic sacrifices, with the examples and teachings of regenerated republicanism. I have always had, and have still, in all of its integrity, a profound faith in the redemption of the people oppressed by errors and prejudices which are nourished by the enslavers of mankind.

I have had, in like manner, and have still, a great confidence that truth shall pass before falsehood, justice before iniquity, and civilization before barbarism, in the interminable road of progress.

With this constant disposition of my moral nature, I have abandoned in a solemn moment the sanctuary of my family and the costly fruit of the long and painful labors of my life, in order to seek a tomb for my country, or a laurel, whose shade the transformed people of Salvador might hail. I had the fortune to obtain the last, and since then an exalted sentiment of my heart has bound me with much more force to the principles which I profess as to men, whatsoever may be their merits, the gratitude which may be due to them, and the rank which may be accorded them in the public estimation.

By the strengthening and practice of these principles I have drawn down the wrath of a prolonged revolutionary tempest and the thunderbolt of civil death upon my head. I have renounced that easily-gotten popularity which those who court public opinion obtain by unlawful transactions and personal complaisance, which sacrifice the common interest to private and bring in subjection to passion the rectitude of conscience and the ascendancy of ideas.

Fellow-citizens: For the ephemeral gratification of occupying the first post of command in Salvador, for the fleeting glories of power, I could not have contemplated the bloodshed of the people, have compromised my existence, and cast my name in the field of human conflicts, where reputations fall and rise, with no other reason than the caprice or expediency of the moment, where passion adores and forsakes its idol in a day.

Making sacrifices which I should not overestimate, I have procured the complete termination of a revolution which, by its vigor, by its date, by its internal and essential relations, and by the changes it has brought, has a character purely Central American, and an exalted mission to accomplish, opposite to the most absolute reactionary movement for a long time incarnate in these five states, in these five members of the family, which was born in one common place, and for which there is but one fate; nor should it have but one thought and one head.

That inclination, that mission of the innovating movement of which I speak, has caused to yield those who have not conformed to it by just consequence.

It is for that reason, that when General Medina, who was President of Honduras, wished to hinder and abandon the work in which he had taken part, in order to preserve his power from a dangerous enemy, he fell a victim like many others to his want of faith in the cause of liberty which he had just invoked, for it is impossible to turn at will the inexorable logic of human things.

You know very well, fellow-citizens, that in the memorable year 1871 was proclaimed here, after a prolonged repression, the exercise of the original rights of man, beginning an era for expansion of ideas and sentiments hidden in the breasts and in the minds of a society made dumb by terror.

In that period of activity and of political fever, a few Hondurans, who were suffering here the lingering sorrows of exile from their home on account of a discretionary government, which was intolerable to them, raised their voices in tones of complaint, of lamentation, of protest, and of anathema, in order to make known the griefs and the sufferings of Honduras, to ask compassion and assistance from their brethren, to paint with lively colors the misconduct of a ruler, converted at his pleasure into a sovereign, into the all-powerful arbitrator of a people which has such glorious traditions, and has given such splendid figures to letters and to liberty.

General Medina wished to condemn me for the immediate effect of the principles proclaimed attributing to my changeableness in our personal relations that which was the spontaneous birth of the democratic doctrines in application.

The lamentable blindness of this most personal of politicians made imminent, made unavoidable, made a reality, war between two administrations, which a short time before had hoisted the same standard in the sight of Central America.

The passion of my enemies has made them say, more than once, that I have been ungrateful to the former President to whom I refer. They pitifully confound that which he did for his own preservation, and the noble sacrifices which the generous Honduran population dedicated to the liberty of Salvador, with the private benefits which I should have acknowledged in my simple condition of man, if I would have received any.

If General Medina has compelled in any way my gratitude in public life, I have had to be ungrateful to him in order to be grateful to this people and to the Hondurans, and consequently to the principles, in which I have made a very sincere and very high profession of faith.

When the cabinet of Comayagua condemned the use which was here made of the public liberties, as they formed the safeguards of Honduras, it committed a grave offense against this republic, and against the unfortunate sister who so many times has poured out her blood for the practice of those same liberties, notwithstanding it was from her bosom, and attacking objects to me so sacred. That cabinet also attacked the democratic institutions, which, as I have already said, are of much more value, in my judgment, than the most conspicuous and extraordinary man in the world.

In consequence of this I was led to the direful extremity of war, which was declared against Salvador, and which I accepted without irresolution, in order to discharge with firmness my duty as a soldier and as a President.

In the supreme hour of this crisis to which I am referring, in the beginning of the struggle undertaken from the motives which I have already assigned, when the fate of all these people hung upon the hazard of a conflict, the licentiate Don Celeo Arias presented himself in this capital, not as a proscribed person, or an emigrant revolutionist for the redemption of his country, but as a man ready to enter the most favorable current of events.

Señor Arias had not the good fortune to consecrate to the assistance of Honduras the sacrifice of a dear interest, the effective work of a patriot in action, or useful or generous thought for the press, and notwithstanding this, he was appointed from this place to succeed General Medina in the chief magistracy, which at that time was vacant.

And Señor Arias was appointed for such purpose by some of his fellow-countrymen, who at that period represented in this place Honduran patriotism, for I invited them to select a person who, transitorily, might be as a national type as a representative of the opinion which was agitated by the neighboring people on the occasion of the change of the personnel of the government.

I knew very well that a few persons, though they may be important ones, cannot constitute the autonomy of an independent state, and that, consequently, the election of Señor Arias for provisional President of Honduras, made in Salvador by a small minority of that country, is a political step which was taken very far from the will of the people, which democratic revolutions require for their legitimacy and justification.

But, under the circumstances to which I refer, no other thing could be done. I did not wish to go to battle against the new chief of the reaction, presenting myself in the field as a conqueror who proposes to make his will felt over the destinies of a people.

I did not wish—I did not even think—to give this or that chief to the Honduranian society, but I judged then, and I think still, that the authors of the first act of the drama in which Señor Arias suddenly appears with applause, on account of the nationality to which they belong, on account of their political and civil condition, and the ideas which they sustained to the end, could very well, if not found a provisional government, clothed in competent authority, serve as a guarantee, and a homogeneous element, so that the majority of their fellow-citizens could give it their support and full assent.

The principal actors of that episode of the drama which is still being unfolded know perfectly well that I tell the truth without coloring or alteration. I tell it clearly and fully, for it so comports with my dignity and character. Thus it accords with history, thus it is necessary for me, in order to demonstrate my fidelity to the doctrines which I proclaim, and to make plain in relief, and not as a sketch, the firmness with which I have proposed to proceed in the high office which I occupy.

For the motives and under the auspices which I have expressed, the war of 1872 was entered into, Señor Arias being carried under the protection of the Salvadoran files, to the end that he should be proclaimed provisional President of his country, and that he might make a call upon the national opinion in order to proclaim the foundations of peace and of law, driven from the Honduran borders.

As a guarantee that to this alone his endeavors were directed, this same Señor Arias pledged himself to me in the city of Gracias to procure quickly the reconstruction of the republic, and to give all of his moral support to the candidacy of Señor Don Ponciano Leiva, who for some time past enjoyed in his country more popularity than any other public man.

That promise was not fulfilled, not even in appearance, and I wished to conceal such a grave fault, banishing it to silence for the sake of concord and peace.

The troops of this republic conquered in all the combats in which they engaged, removed the Medina administration, giving its situation to the one which came to replace it, with a programme of solutions and reforms in favor of liberty.

That field happily crowned by us, our valiant and honorable struggles did not leave in their passage gibbets raised by them in order to sacrifice patriots, spoliations and taunts perpetrated in the abuse of strength; they did not return to their point of departure carrying booty, as those who conquer do in all the world; they were not an onerous tax, oppressive, unjust clauses to the government of Señor Arias, which remained established in Comayagua without any danger, and founded with absolute independence by those who by their heroism carried him from the camp to the throne.

That work concluded by the valiant and opportune aid of the government of Guatemala, Honduras has seen that the external troops, who overthrew the tyranny which overwhelmed her, did not remain as the invading troops of another time, an open furrow in the heart, and the seed of discord sown by violence.

In a contrary sense, the aid dispensed to a government which was proclaimed without affront or resistance, for the country which saw it appear as a great promise of justice and reparation, made to palpitate a sentiment of brotherhood in the liberal hearts of those people, united by nature and by common sacrifices, and there remained established the most perfect political consolidation of the cabinets charged with the relieving of their destinies.

This consolidation, this close alliance, is the expression of a fundamental and unalienable truth, which rules the interior life of Central America, whose organic unity, the artificial separation of her members, her badly-understood interests, and the passions engaged in pursuing a like absurdity, have not been able to destroy.

The experience of the events place at each step, in evidence, that truth which we forget from seeing isolated parts, instead of studying the intimate relations which bind the whole.

The filibuster takes a port on the shores of Nicaragua, and Central America puts herself in motion, and rushes united to combat in defense of her independence and her privileges as attributes of one people threatened with conquest and usurpation. One government falls, and another rises in the morning or in the evening, and the occurrence holds its place through the action of a neighboring power, which has given its support and its resources to the triumphant opposition.

Such a political phenomenon has its cause, or its reason, in the identity of aims of sentiments, and of interests which exist between the liberals on one side, and on the other between the reactionists in all of this central part of the American continent.

A revolution or intestine war bursts out in any of our republics, and the Central American people is disturbed, as the human organism is disturbed when one of its sensitive nerves is affected or one of its arteries is wounded. This incontrovertible fact, proved by the history of our life of independence, causes the general principles of public right to suffer here profound modifications in their application in obedience to what might be termed the peculiar and exceptional politics of Central America.

If to this consideration is added the circumstance that the government of Señor Arias was established in consequence of the success obtained in Honduras by the united arms of Salvador and Guatemala, the intervention of the allies remains fully justified, so far as it has relation to fighting a common enemy, and to procuring the security and the unfolding of the politics which they sustain.

Short of this transcendental point, the administration with which I occupy myself has had the most complete liberty of action during the twenty months of its existence.

Established in a dictatorship from its commencement, it has exercised its power at discretion and absolutely, employing harsh measures, condemned with bitterness by the most distinguished Hondurans, because, before the filibustering expedition of Señor Palacios they had not had in their country either wars, rebellions, or tumultuous crowds of such magnitude as might make necessary the prolongation of that dangerous form of government beheld with repugnance or distrust by the liberals of the monarchical system and of modern republicanism.

The long duration of such a rule gave occasion to many and very conspicuous countrymen of Señor Arias to address themselves privately to me, informing me that he defrauded the faith and hopes of the liberals, that his conduct contradicted his words, and that the means of his power being weakened by this he would very soon be without strength to resist the sudden energetic attacks of the reactionists and to stifle any unforeseen movement of the demagogues.

I heard with composure any such insinuations, trusting that in spite of such an anomalous situation, the society of Honduras would at last legally establish their government. But, nevertheless, I did not confine myself to an attitude of expectancy, since at different periods I have sent out from this republic six expeditions, with the object of putting down insurrectionary movements which threatened the existence of the government to which I allude.

Penetrated by the sincere respect which the self-government of the sister and allied country merited from me, I allowed myself to solicit privately and in a friendly manner the liberty of General Don José Maria Medina, under my guarantee, without prejudice, to which, according to the laws, he might make himself responsible for his conduct as governor.

My demand being refused by the provisional chief, lately expelled, I yielded it, preserving the most profound silence in homage to his right.

But there came the undisciplined expedition of the Sherman, organized in Costa Rica, and protected by General Guardia, President of that country; but there came united the principal reactionists of the whole of Central America, giving the voice of war from the Atlantic coasts of Honduras against all of the existing liberal governments, as if in that territory should be decided the fate of two bands, which since 1821 have kept up a perpetual duel in these territories; and in this eventful hour, in the face of an adversary who appeared suddenly with very deficient power, the dictatorship of Comayagua was feeble and insufficient to conquer it unaided, as proved by the reverses of Opoteca and the triumphs of Chamelicon and La Paz.

The forces of Salvador did not enter the field until it was absolutely necessary, when the enemies of liberty were infesting even the suburbs of the capital of Honduras, and in that place was reeling the unpopular administration which has just bequeathed its name to history.

When I saw myself obliged to move the division of Espinosa, I deemed it opportune and suitable to address a private letter to the licentiate Señor Arias, supplicating him to resign to one of three honorable and impartial persons the power which he was exercising so painfully and violently. That document was written in terms respectful, but frank and faithful, and it contains friendly reflections, dictated by a sincerely republican spirit. For this reason I wish that it may see the public light in order to serve as a corroboration of my assertions and to make more patent my right intentions.

A few days after I had taken this step the conference of Chingo took place, where, with the President of Guatemala, we consulted one more time to secure the liberty and peace of Central America. There was present in confederation with that Mandatoria Señor Don Ponciano Leiva, the most popular political personage of Honduras, and after having spoken cautiously about the painful situation of his country, General Barrios and I believed that the horrors of anarchy were imminent there, with inevitable damage to our governments, unless a prudent resolution was adopted, which might combine justice with expedience.

It was agreed that Señor Leiva should inaugurate a provisional government upon his native soil, and that if the majority of the people accepted him he might rely upon the protection of the allied military forces in the theater of events.

But as a step previous to this, and wishing to avoid any collision whatever, General Barrios and I addressed Señor Arias privately and together, representing to him the peremptory necessity of resigning his power to some conspicuous citizen, in order to put an end to the difficulties which embarrassed the free and peaceful expressions of the Hondurians in the legal organization of their government.

That cordial and dispassionate appeal which we made in the name of the liberal ideas and of the equilibrarians of Central America, failing, it was necessary to put at work the last resolution, dictated by necessity and patriotism, and it has answered perfectly our designs and hopes.

In every part of Honduras the new government has been spontaneously applauded. The humblest as well as the most influential classes of society, without intrigue, without pressure or threat of any kind, have recognized and saluted the genuine representative of the popular sentiment.

The patriot, who carries in one hand the olive of peace through every part, and in the other the emblem of justice, makes authority lawful without impairing the right.

It is a principle generally taken for granted by public writers, that when two governments figure in one country, established as if they were independent states, the rest of the nations have the right to recognize that which they judge to be the most legal, and which most suits their convenience.

In the case in question Salvador and Guatemala have seen in the revolutionary government of Señor Leiva the expressive symbol of the sovereignty of Honduras; they have practiced well their right in recognizing it; have fulfilled a high duty to brotherhood and civilization, by giving spirit to the people, to their true allies, so that they might recover their lost liberty and repair their great damages.

All of the circumstances which I have imprinted on the memory make stronger the reasons which I have had for cutting off certain abstract formulas relating to the question of Honduras. In it is secured the existence of my government and the fate of the principles which it has proclaimed, and I do not regard politics as a poetical fiction, but as a calculation and a foresight, which ought to be directed to obtain the good of the greater number.

For this reason I have accepted with firmness a grave responsibility in the present circumstances. For this reason when a subaltern of Señor Arias seized in Amapala a Salvadorian vessel, and the reactionary currents reached even from the Gulf of Nicoya to that of Fonseca, I did not fear to take that port by main force, in concurrence with the popular government of Señor Lieva, and as an indispensable means of safety, so as to see quickly the solution of the problem which has happily terminated in Comayagua.

With the hope that all of these complications might have for an end a near triumph of right, I have wished to keep a complete reserve until the present; then I feared an unpremeditated revelation on my part might compromise the end that we proposed to pursue peacefully with the friendly and allied government of Guatemala, whose troops have labored in perfect concord with those of Salvador, the chiefs who commanded each having decisive orders not to fire a rifle until after exhausting the last efforts of conciliation.

Fellow-citizens: I have not encountered the passionate judgments and the inconsiderate censures which have been emitted to vilify my intentions, to acquire a most miserable conquest, a hand-breadth of the land of a sister people, whose misfortunes I lament with religious respect.

I have not turned the arms of Salvador against the dictatorial government of Señor Arias on account of hatred of his person, or because I was inspired by rivalry, fears, and distrust. No! I esteem him according to his merits, and solely for political considerations of great magnitude have I been able to put myself in the extremity whither my fervent desire to see guaranteed the future happiness of these people has carried me.

In that grave affair, as in my home administration, I have had to employ laws of action—proceedings determined by the time and by the circumstances, in order to save the permanent interests confided to my keeping.

General Jackson saved the independence of the American Union, suspending temporarily some of the individual guarantees of the North American people. There, where liberty has an altar in the heart of each man, Lincoln saved the Union of that great people, saved their wise Constitution, and was the redeemer of five millions of men, suspending the privilege of habeas corpus and silencing periodical publications.

In imitation of these great apostles of right, and perhaps with more necessity than they, we have republican rulers here who dictate measures, for the time repressive, in order to save society from the hell of anarchy, or from the limbo of despotism.

I believe that peace will continue, quickly and definitely secured, and that the democratic institutions which I have sworn to plant and defend will open in the future a beautiful and peaceful field to all the sons of Salvador, and to all who wish to come to her hospitable shores.

With this flattering hope I believe it will be easy for me to descend from the high position where I am to-day, and leaving re-established the fruitful principle of alternation of citizens in power and the example of the fealty of a ruler who submits, without reserve, all of his actions to the sovereign judgment of public opinion.

Such are, fellow-citizens, the convictions, the sentiments, and the aims of him who submits himself to your judgment, and to that of history, and who has the honor to call himself your faithful friend and servant.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you, for your information, the original and translated copy of an extract from the report of the secretary of foreign affairs of Salvador to the Constituent Assembly.

The extract is taken from the "Boletin Oficial," March 31.

You will observe the government of Salvador seems to attach importance to the exercise of my good offices, in December last, in behalf of peace in Central America.

(Extract from the report of the minister of foreign affairs of Salvador.)

SAN SALVADOR, January 31, 1874.

The President of Costa Rica, no doubt wrongly informed, was manifesting somewhat, in the various acts of his policy, overt hostility toward Salvador as well as toward the other Central American states. For this reason the treaty of triple alliance between Salvador, Guatemala, and Nicaragua was negotiated, at Managua, about the close of last August.

Afterward, the condemnation by the cabinet of Costa Rica of this alliance, that the constitutional assembly of the preceding year had examined and approved, increased to the greatest excess, but Salvador, on her part, did not wish them to memorialize her arguments or official remonstrances, for she considered that once this having been commenced she could not remain in statu quo without injury to her national dignity, and would very probably arrive at the brink of a disastrous war, which ought always, as a terrible calamity, to be reserved for the last resort, from which there is positively no escape.

The President of Salvador believed that, with the lapse of a little time, the progress of events would show the folly of a fratricidal war, and of discord, between provinces that ought continually to become more closely united and identified. So it proved in the end. The President of Costa Rica abandoned that hostile policy, and has turned his thoughts to the consideration of the ideas of peace and concord that have been proposed to the Presidents of Central America through the honorable mediation of the American minister.

This honorable diplomat, without compromising his official character, has prepared, in connection with the President of Costa Rica and the British chargé d'affaires, a memorandum in which was embraced and adopted a meeting of the five Central American Presidents, in a place to be selected, to treat of a general peace. This plan has been unanimously approved, and has only been delayed to select the time and place for accomplishing it. It is probable that from this meeting will follow not only the establishment of a lasting peace, but a basis for Central American organization.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you a terrible outrage was perpetrated yesterday by the commandant of San José de Guatemala upon the person of Mr. John Magee, Her Britannic Majesty's vice-consul at that place. He had Mr. Magee very severely flogged, inflicting on him, it is reported, over two hundred lashes.

The government here denounced the outrage as a disgrace to Guatemala.

The minister of war called upon me this morning to say that no effort would be left untried to arrest and punish the offender, and also that ample reparation would be made to the British government and the injured gentleman.

The British minister is absent on leave, but his chargé d'affaires is acting with promptitude and ability.

The perpetrator of the outrage, I am informed, is a renegade Spaniard from Cuba.

When I receive all of the facts I will communicate more fully.

[Extract.]

No. 146 bis.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA, Guatemala, May 4, 1874. (Received June 8.)

SIR: I have now the honor to lay before you a full statement in regard to the outrage committed upon the British vice-consul, Mr. John Magee, at San José, by the commandante of that port, on the 24th ultimo, and of which I advised you in my No. 139, dated the 25th ultimo.

I also inclose you with this dispatch copies of all the papers that have come into my possession concerning it. Among them you will notice particularly the statement of Mr. Edwin James, consular agent at San José, No. 8, which I have reason to believe, although defective by the omission of some details, is substantially correct.

I hope his conduct in using every exertion to prevent the infliction of a barbarous outrage upon an innocent official of a friendly power, and to preserve the life of a fellow-creature, will meet your approbation. He evidently ran great personal risk in throwing any obstacle in the way of such a madman as the commandante of San José seems to have been. Your attention is respectfully called to inclosure No. 7, in which the victim, Mr. John Magee, officially acknowledges his indebtedness to Mr. James for saving his life.

Among the inclosures you will find several telegrams from this legation. The one marked No. 1 was sent at the urgent solicitation of President Barrios, whose prime minister called on me about 8 o'clock on the morning of the 25th, and stated that the conduct of Gonzalez was a disgrace to Guatemala; that his government was extremely anxious to make every reparation in its power to the British government, not only by trial and punishment of the commandante, but in other satisfactory ways.

He also said that General Solares had arrived, or would arrive, at San José within a very short time, and that the commandante was a deserter from the army and a fugitive on board of an American ship lying at the port of San José. He urged me to order the delivery of Gonzalez to General Solares. I replied that I had no right to order his delivery, but would request it, which I thought would be quite as effectual, as the ship was lying in Guatemalan waters.

The telegram was then written and presented to him to read. He said it was perfectly satisfactory, and that he would take it himself to the telegraph-office to have it dispatched forthwith.

Gonzalez had already been shot, it seems, before my telegram was written. At all events, Mr. James and the agent of the ship tell me it was not received on board. At the time of the prime minister's visit, he seemed to be as ignorant as I really was of the fact that Mr. James had taken the commandante on the ship. Had I known that Mr. James had agreed to take the commandante on board of the ship, under the protection of the American flag, (although his only warrant in so using the flag was a generous impulse to save Mr. Magee's life, by placing his persecutor and intended murderer in safety,) I should not have thought of making a request that implied a disposition to violate the agreement.

The statement made in the telegram, that Mr. Gonzalez "has committed a grave outrage upon the persons of American citizens" was based upon the minister's declaration to me. He said the commandante, in his fit of madness, had struck in the face an officer of an American ship, and afterward imprisoned him for an hour or two; furthermore, that he had grossly insulted the consular agent at San José.

To this declaration I simply replied my countrymen would probably receive ample redress after their case was duly investigated. The oral and verbal report of the consular agent shows the minister was mistaken.

About 11 o'clock on the 25th the prime minister, Mr. Samayoa, again called upon me, and stated that Commandante Gonzalez had been mortally wounded while attempting to go on board the Pacific mail steamship Arizona, by a Colombian, resident in Guatemala, named Don Pedro Vazquez, and that his government wished me to telegraph to the captain of the ship to deliver that gentleman to the military authority at San José, General Solares. I declined either to order or request his delivery, but stated I would telegraph to the consular agent for full particulars, and after getting his report, would decide whether to make a request. He said that would be entirely satisfactory to his government.

The ship sailed, as you will see by inclosure No. 5, before my telegram was received.

The commandante, Gonzalez, was not mortally wounded, as was supposed. He is now in this city in the hospital, and is said to be recovering. His alleged aiders and abettors, a Mr. Bulnes, Viteré, and Corso, all officials at San José, are now here in prison.

Mr. John Magee, the vice-consul, is also in this city, and, though confined to his bed, is "doing well."

The outrage gave rise to quite an active correspondence between the British chargé d'affaires, Mr. Henry Scholfield, and the government, which resulted, on the 1st instant, in the protocol No. 10 which accompanies this dispatch.*

The minister of foreign affairs and the prime minister, Mr. Samayoa, express much satisfaction with the result, and seem to feel a decided assurance that the British government will not claim any indemnity or demand any further satisfaction than that which is agreed upon in the protocol.

They called to see me, and in an interview invited my opinion.

I had none to express, except that, in my judgment, they might well congratulate themselves on their diplomatic tact in the management of the affair.

Mr. Scholfield also frequently called upon me, and explained his proceedings, which, assuming he had the authority, met my approbation up to the time of the protocol and his letter No. 11.

In the unreserved confidence of official correspondence, I beg leave to say again, assuming he had authority to arrange so important an international question without definite instructions from the foreign office, that he has been somewhat behind the Guatemalan officials in his diplomacy. It is true, Mr. Magee's rather singular renunciation in advance of any claim to indemnity presented a serious and perplexing embarrassment. It is equally true the promptness of the government in arresting the guilty parties, as well as its elaborate professions of a determination to make every reparation in its power for the outrage, made it more delicate to deal with the question. I might have done much worse.

It is probable the parties charged with the outrage will be held in prison until a favorable answer is received from the British government.

After that their friends will probably find no serious obstacle in the way of their escape from the punishment of the laws. Justice has not become a blind goddess in Central America yet.

Although in this entire transaction American influence has not been impaired, I cannot but share in some degree the apprehension generally expressed by foreigners in regard to its effect upon the conduct of officials of the government toward them in departments under jefe politico who are distant from the capital. All of them express the opinion that no punishment will be inflicted on the offenders. If, they say, a vice-consul of one of the most powerful nations can be whipped by a commandante of a little post of thirty-five soldiers, right under the eye of the government, and connected with the capital by telegraph, what must be expected in distant departments, where it takes weeks to communicate. If, they say, such an official as Gonzalez is a type, (and they allege he is,) what guarantee have foreigners that they will not be dealt with both unjustly and cruelly throughout the state, in all instances in which a drunken or crazy jefe politico chooses to take offense and apply the lash.

They talk indiscreetly of President Barrios having set the example to his officials by using the whip as a punishment upon some of the best families in the country, whose only crime was that they differed from him in political opinion.

There is no doubt that foreigners are apprehensive of unpleasant consequences if the British government ratifies the agreement of the protocol and the criminals go unpunished, as they say they expect.

The feeling against the government at present is by no means favorable, and the reactionary or conservative party enjoys its sneers in pointing to the outrage as an evidence of the "liberalism" and humanity of a government which met the approval of foreigners as long as the whipping was confined to the old families of Guatemala. It must be confessed there is some justice in the sneer.

Such an outrage, in my opinion, could scarcely have occurred in any other Central American state.

Mr. Magee might have been shot in other states, but not flogged.

* * * * *

I lay the facts and suggestions before you for your consideration, and beg leave to add that, in my judgment, it would be well for the Secretary of the Navy to consider the propriety of ordering the commanders of our men-of-war in the Pacific to call at Central American ports as often as the interests of the public service will allow, whenever they are passing up or down from San Francisco. Such an order might prevent much trouble.

SAN JOSÉ, April 26, 1874.

DEAR SIR: It is with most heartfelt thanks that I address you these lines, to thank you for the action you took in my behalf in my late trouble with Commandante Gonzalez.

On board the steamer Arizona I heard it rumored that you had not exerted yourself as fully as you might have done, but in the critical position in which I was placed the prudence with which you acted, at the same time that you really jeopardized your own liberty, does you great credit.

Had you acted precipitately, as many of the too-justly indignant passengers on the Arizona were desirous that you should have acted, you would have signed my death-warrant.

The protest you entered was stamped under foot by the commandante, an act of outlawry which proved the man's madness, and made it presumptuous to consider that anything could be gained by asserting the respect due to a foreign power.

Again I have to repeat that I am indebted to your prudence, as well as to your constant and untiring efforts, for my life; a debt of gratitude which I shall never forget.

Believe me, &c.,

J. MAGEE.

Her Britannic Majesty's Vice-Consul.

[Inclosure 8 in No. 146 bis.]

SAN JOSÉ, April 26, 1874.

SIR: On the arrival of the steamship Arizona at the port, on the morning of the 24th, the chief officer of the ship came ashore to see Mr. Magee about discharging his ship.

On his return to the steamer he was met by the comandante on the head of the pier, who told him he would not permit him to embark. The officer reported the case to me. I at once went to the comandante, and told him he must not interfere with American sailors passing to and from their ships; so he let him off. An hour after I received a message that Mr. Magee and Mr. Moncrieff were prisoners, and in prison, by order of the commandante. I went to the commandante to inquire what he had arrested them for. His reply was he would release Mr. Moncrieff, but he would give Mr. Magee five hundred lashes to-day, and to-morrow he would shoot him. His reasons: he had sent for Magee to come to his house; Magee, having a sore foot, sent back word he could not come. The commandante then sent word to Magee to state his reasons for not coming in writing.

Magee's written reasons were he had a sore foot, and, besides, his position as British vice-consul exempted him from appearing.

The commandante then sent a guard of soldiers to bring him; and if he would not come, to arrest him or shoot him.

The soldiers went to the house of Magee and took him prisoner. Before leaving his house Magee put a pistol in his pocket. On appearing before the commandante (who met him going up stairs) he asked him why he had brought that pistol with him. Mr. Magee replied: "Knowing you to be a very violent man, I carry this pistol to defend myself." The commandante then struck Magee several times in the face, and told him to-day he would give him five hundred lashes and to-morrow he would shoot him. This was about 12 o'clock, (noon.)

I did not think the commandante would dare to carry out his threats; but I was very much mistaken, for at 4 o'clock p. m. the soldiers were formed, the bugles sounded, and Magee was brought up to be lashed.

I at once went to my office and wrote a protest, in the name of the United States, against such a disgraceful outrage against humanity, civilization, and all law, human and divine; but he would not receive my protest or listen to me in any way. I was rudely put down stairs by the soldiers, and he carried out his shameful and infamous outrage on the person of a representative of a civilized and Christian nation. I tried to telegraph you several times during the day, but the commandante had seized the telegraph, and would permit no communication on that day, so I acted on my own judgment, and am responsible for all of my actions, and will accept any result they may entail; and if my conduct has exceeded my official duty, I can only say I will be satisfied with any action you may conceive it your duty to take in reference to the whole course of this disgraceful affair.

My conduct will never bring a blush to the cheek of an American.

During the whole course of the day I could not get an opportunity to tell the commandante of the dreadful result of his conduct.

This day, all day, he was blind and stupid with drink and revenge. But something must be done. Magee has received two hundred and ten lashes. The first part of the threat has been carried out; and the second was, that to-morrow morning Magee must die. Nearly every foreigner had fled the port. I determined to save his life, whether it was my official duty or not, whether I saved my own life or not.

I waited till morning; got up very early, that I might see the commandante before he had taken any drink. About 7 a. m. I saw the commandante bringing Magee out. He formed the soldiers, and was ready to flog Magee again. I immediately went up to him and told him not to attempt to go any farther with this infamous outrage. He said he was going to give Magee more lashes and then shoot him. I told him it would ruin him and bring misfortune on his country—perhaps ruin. He listened to me and began to think and understand his situation. He said, "I am ruined any way; and before the event I will kill Magee." He then says, "I will flee the country; and if Magee will give me money I will go aboard the steamer, if you will put me safely there."

Magee at once said, I will give you all the money you want.

I pledged him the protection of the American flag. At this time the captain of the Arizona (Captain Morse) sent me word he was going to leave. I wrote him a note imploring him to delay an hour longer. I had the money in my pocket, and the commandante was ready to go. He bid Magee "good-bye," and told him he was free. I walked down the pier with him, and we got into the boat together and pushed away. I had now succeeded in saving Magee's life, and now risked my own, for when the boat had arrived at the steps of the steamer's ladder, I got out first, the commandante following me, with one foot on the steps and the other still on the boat, when the passengers, armed with pistols, opened fire on the commandante, after I had promised him the protection of our flag. It was on this condition he had agreed to spare Magee.

He received two mortal wounds, stepped back into the boat and went to the shore. He now lies in a dying condition.

I regret this last outrage. In justice to Captain Morse, I must say he did all that he could to prevent it.

I am, &c.,

EDWIN JAMES.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP ARIZONA, April 25, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to advise your excellency that, owing to the large number of passengers, limited amount of coal, and scarcity of commissary stores, I have found it necessary to resume my voyage.

As Mr. Magee, for whose preservation I apprehend I am detained, is now safe, the cause of his danger having been removed, there seems now to be no urgent necessity for my remaining longer to the injury not only of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, but to each of my many passengers, as I am in no way responsible for the rash act of an unseen hand which will probably prove fatal to the commandante of the port, and no amount of precaution could have prevented it.

I had placed guards at every available point about the vessel with the view to guard against any such contingency.

Under these circumstances I feel confident that you will approve of my immediate departure, inasmuch as Mr. Magee dispatches the ship himself.

I am, your excellency's obedient servant,

A. G. MORSE.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you two copies of a small pamphlet issued by the government of Guatemala, embodying the correspondence with the British chargé d'affaires in regard to the outrage upon Mr. John Magee, the British vice-consul at San José, of which I gave you a full account in my No. 146 bis.

As it might be inferred, from the statement made in the last paragraph of page 5, that I might be somewhat responsible for the wounding of Commandante Gonzalez when he attempted to go on board the Arizona, I send you the original of my telegram, which has been returned to me by Mr. A. Señor Soto to Mr. Scholfield.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Guatemala, April 25, 1874.

SIR: Yesterday, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, you were pleased to call upon me at the ministry of foreign relations for the purpose of laying before me a telegram which you had just received, and in which it was stated that Mr. John Magee, vice-consul of Her Britannic Majesty, had been arrested by order of the commandante of the port of San José, a Spaniard in the service of the government, José Gonzalez by name.

I took you at once before the president of the republic, who, after having heard your statement, instructed the minister of war to direct General Gregorio Solares, who was at Escuintla, to repair at once to San José and set Mr. Magee at liberty, ordering Commandante Gonzalez, at the same time, to appear before the government and give an account of his conduct, and, in case of his having cut the telegraph-line, to bring him, securely guarded, to this capital.

This order was given to General Solares, because the inspector of telegraphs reported that the telegraph-line to the port of San José was not working, for the reason, as was suspected, that the office had been closed by Commandante Gonzalez himself.

If the telegraph had been in working order as far as the port, the order for the release of Mr. Magee would have been sent directly.

At about half past five in the afternoon the telegraph was again in working order, and the news was then received that Commandante Gonzalez had ordered Mr. John Magee, vice-consul of Her Britannic Majesty, to be flogged.

As soon as the government was informed of this outrage, it ordered, as you are aware, the political chief of Escuintla to go, with the garrison of that place, to the port of San José, to the end that General Solares might be the better enabled to arrest the delinquents and other persons implicated in so criminal an act. Moreover, to prevent the guilty parties from escaping, strict orders were given to the frontier authorities of Salvador and Mexico, in order that the crime to which I refer might in no case remain unpunished.

Later in the evening the President, not being content with the prompt measures already taken, went to the telegraph-office, accompanied by the minister of war, where he remained until after midnight, dictating orders that the life of Vice-Consul Magee should be saved by all means, since the distance did not permit him to act more efficiently.

The measures adopted resulted in protecting Mr. Magee from further outrages and in saving his life, which was in imminent danger from the rage of the Spaniard Gonzalez, who, on the arrival of General Solares, put off in a boat to the North American steamer Arizona, intending to seek refuge on board of that vessel.

The government, on learning this, requested the minister of the United States to order the commander of said steamer by no means to allow the fugitive Gonzalez to take refuge on board. The minister gave the order, as requested, and not only was admission on board of the steamer denied Gonzalez, but, as is known, he received a shot from the vessel, the particulars of which circumstance have not yet been received by the government. This occurrence caused Gonzalez to return to land, where he was at once captured by General Solares, together with the persons who appear to have been his accomplices.

The unjustifiable act to which I have been referring renders it incumbent upon me to address you, before any complaint is made, assuring you that this irregular and culpable proceeding has filled my government with great pain and indignation, and that, fully realizing the gravity of the occurrence, my government, as soon as informed thereof, acted with all the energy and zeal demanded by the friendly relations which have existed and do exist between the governments of Her Britannic Majesty and that of Guatemala. You have been a witness of the earnest solicitude of my government and of the manner in which it has deplored the outrage done to the consular agent of Her Britannic Majesty.

My government, sir, which sincerely desires to cultivate the most friendly relations with foreign powers, and especially with Great Britain, is ready, in view of this unfortunate occurrence, to give a further proof of this desire, and also of its determination that no foreigner coming to this republic shall be injured either in person or property, but that, on the contrary, all shall enjoy the hospitality of this country, with all the guarantees and securities that are furnished by the most civilized nations of the world. You may rest assured that the parties who have been guilty of the criminal act in question will be punished to the full extent of the law; also, that my government will give the fullest satisfaction to that of Her Britannic Majesty, and that it will make due reparation when the investigation which it has ordered shall be closed.

I have the honor to reiterate to you, sir, the assurances of my high consideration, and to subscribe myself,

Your obedient servant,

MARCO A. SOTO.

Mr. HENRY SCHOLFIELD,

Chargé d'Affaires of Her Britannic Majesty in Central America.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 153—Translation.]

Protocol of the conference held at the ministry of foreign relations of Guatemala, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, May 1, 1874, between the licentiate Don Marco A. Soto, minister of foreign relations of said republic, and Mr. Henry Scholfield, chargé d'affaires ad interim of Her Britannic Majesty, for the purpose of determining the satisfaction which is to be given by Guatemala to the English government, in view of the outrage done in the port of San José to Mr. John Magee, British vice-consul, by Commandante José Gonzalez, a Spaniard in the service of the republic.

1st. The aforesaid chargé d'affaires stated that being convinced of the desire of the government of Guatemala to settle this matter in a manner satisfactory to both governments, as declared in the letter of this ministry of the 25th of April last, in which he was informed that the parties guilty of the criminal act in question should be punished to the full extent of the law; that this government, moreover, would give the fullest satisfaction to that of Her Britannic Majesty, and would make due reparation when the investigation ordered by it should be finished; the chargé d'affaires, being convinced of this, said that, since the initiatory steps had already been taken, he desired that the final settlement of this matter should be explicitly agreed upon. The minister of foreign relations stated that his government, in accordance with what it had promised to Her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires, had already ordered, through the supreme court of justice, the offenders to be arraigned before the ordinary courts for trial and punishment, according to the laws of the country, since the outrage had been committed in the territory of the republic, the government of Guatemala thinking that by this step the best satisfaction would be given that it could offer that of Her Britannic Majesty, in accordance with the practice of civilized nations. Mr. Scholfield declared himself satisfied with this action on the part of the government.

2d. In testimony of the desire of the government of Guatemala to preserve the most friendly relations with that of Her Britannic Majesty, and as a proof of the deep pain with which it has seen the outrage which has been done to Vice-Consul Magee, the government will order a salute of twenty-one guns to the British flag to be fired in the port of San José on such day as may be agreed upon with Her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires.

3d. Her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires also asked an indemnity for the outrage done to Vice-Consul Magee by Commandant Gonzalez. The minister of foreign relations stated that the government of Guatemala did not consider itself under obligations to pay such indemnity: first, because Mr. Magee, as was known to the chargé d'affaires, had officially declared that he did not wish his government to make any claim, and that he himself would make none; second, because the government of Guatemala did not think the case to be one demanding indemnity according to the general principles of justice and the special circumstances of the act giving rise to this claim.

The government of Guatemala declares, however, that if that of Her Britannic Majesty, when it shall have full knowledge of the affair, of the conduct of the government of Guatemala in the matter, and of the manner in which it has deplored this occurrence, shall think proper to ask for indemnity, and shall insist upon it, notwithstanding the desire to the contrary expressed by Mr. Magee, then the government of Guatemala will enter into negotiations with that of Her Britannic Majesty for the settlement of that point.

4th. It was finally agreed that the subject of this protocol should be settled in these terms, and that the government of Her Britannic Majesty should make no claim on this ground in future, save such as might arise from the 3d point, on indemnification.

In testimony whereof, the present protocol was signed and sealed in duplicate by the licentiate Don Marco A. Soto, minister of foreign relations, and Mr. Henry Scholfield, chargé d'affaires of Her Britannic Majesty, both pledging themselves to fulfill the stipulations made by their respective governments, at Guatemala, May first, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four.

MARCO A. SOTO,
Minister of Foreign Relations of Guatemala.

Chargé d'Affaires of H. B. M.

BRITISH LEGATION,
Guatemala, April 30, 1874.

SIR: Last Sunday, when I had the honor and pleasure of visiting your excellency, you were kind enough to indicate to me that it would be advisable to put in writing the exact nature of the satisfaction for the outrage on Vice-Consul Magee that would be accepted by Her Britannic Majesty's government.

With the view therefore of setting at rest this affair, the importance of which cannot be exaggerated, I have the honor of requesting an interview, at the hour that may be most convenient to you, so that we may agree upon a memorandum on the subject that shall be binding on our respective governments.

I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat to your excellency the assurance of my most cordial friendship.

GUATEMALA, May 2, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's dispatch of April 25, informing me of the outrage on Vice-Consul Magee at San José, and of the steps taken by the government of the republic in connection therewith.

I cheerfully bear witness to the horror and indignation with which, not only all the members of your government, but all classes of society in Guatemala have reprobated this deplorable event; and I have seen with the greatest satisfaction the energy and good feeling that were displayed by the President and all the ministers, who by their thoughtfulness and promptitude have avoided what, at one time, threatened to become a catastrophe for the republic.

The frank and loyal explanations and apologies, so spontaneously tendered to my government, reflect the utmost honor on this administration, who have thus proved that they sincerely desire to protect with equal rights the native and the foreigner.

In congratulating myself on the settlement of this matter, I have to thank your excellency for the conciliatory and friendly manner in which the negotiations have been conducted.

I avail myself of this opportunity to repeat to your excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

HENRY SCHOLFIELD.

No. 159.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
 May 23, 1874. (Received June 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose you translated copies of the message of President Guardia, of Costa Rica, dated the 1st May, and of the answer of the Constituent Assembly, dated May 12.

I have made marginal marks on pages 3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 13, 14, and 17 of the former, to which your attention is respectfully invited.

His frank acknowledgment of the serious opposition his government encounters, is so unusual in public documents in this quarter, that it excites my admiration, while it convinces me the disaffection is more wide spread than I ventured to state in my No. 124.

His statement in regard to the resources of the country enabling the government to carry on the work of the railroad to Port Limon, and, at the same time, to pay its expenses and meet obligations, is so grave a mistake, one might well be surprised if he were a stranger. I believe it is a matter of public notoriety that the last four installments on Costa Rica bonds, issued and negotiated for railroad purposes, have not been provided for. It is so published in the newspapers, and I understand the English agent here says such is the fact.

I still have some hope the railroad may be completed from Alajuela (a place in the interior, where it now begins) to Port Limon; but if it is true, as asserted, that the British bondholders have declared their determination to take no more bonds of Costa Rica as long as President Guardia remains in power, that hoped-for event may be delayed several years. To our country the completion of that line would tend far more to advance its commercial interests than of the road now finished from ocean to ocean.

There is but little doubt the telegraph line from Punta Arenas to Port Limon will be finished before many months elapse unless a revolution occurs.

I have, &c.,

GEO. WILLIAMSON.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 159.—Translation.]

Message of the President of the republic of Costa Rica to the National Congress, May 1, 1874

Honorable representatives of the people: The opening of your session is very pleasing to me, as it to-day complies with the rule prescribed in the constitution of the republic.

Some of you already have experience in those affairs that during past years have been the object of the conscientious consideration of the national representation. Others have been called recently by the vote of the people to the honored position in which the free suffrages of their constituents have placed them.

You, together, form the sovereignty, and I do not doubt that, penetrated by the great importance of your mission, you will all be able to provide for the necessities of your country.

Placed in a position superior to my merits, but not to my sincerity, self-denial, and patriotism, which I have shown so often, that I justly believe you can appreciate these, so I will immediately submit to your distinguished consideration the principal affairs of the administration.

Costa Rica is at peace, and no accident disturbs the pleasant relations that exist with foreign nations, with which she is connected by treaties of amity and commerce.

The proper secretary will give you an account of what has been agreed upon with His Majesty the King of Italy. From want of time, I was unable to present it for your consideration during the last session.

The same secretary will give you an account of the treaty of boundary, celebrated between this republic and that of the United States of Colombia, and also of additional conventions.

Respecting the republics of Central America, sisters of Costa Rica, the government could encourage no sentiment that would not tend to the preservation and increase of those good relations that ought to bind together the people who formed for a long period one nation.

Although there have been moments in which evil tidings, arising from various sudden changes of the functions of these countries, caused a rupture to appear imminent, prevented by the indestructible bonds, and community of interest, my heart's sentiments, adhering closely to sister nationalities, strengthen with my constant faith in the fraternity, not only of Central America, but of all republics that have the same origin.

Always solicitous for the accomplishment of so grand an idea, I will not lose an opportunity of proving, with deeds, the sentiments I have just now uttered, even if any sacrifice on my part will serve to contribute towards fixing a firm basis for the future union of the countries, invoked to form one single nationality.

The interior tranquillity has remained unchanged, but I ought not to conceal that I have been compelled to repress different attempts to subvert public order.

I understand very well that no government will ever exist that has no opposition. I also believe it is useful when inspired by true patriotism, and has for a guide frankness, and for its sole aim the public welfare.

I have always been very far from condemning this unquestionable right, naturally belonging to every citizen of a free republic, of forming an opinion concerning that which belongs to all and is for all, and of making it known, even in the seat of the government. The authorized word of the patriot, whatever it may be, is always respectable, for it is inspired by the rectitude of justice and by the goodness of intention.

Nothing has been more pleasing than any inspiration of this kind. I have always been disposed to listen to every one, understanding how difficult is the task of governing, and how much the assistance of other minds can contribute to the general welfare that bring disinterested assistance for transacting business.

But although such are my convictions, and cherishing the veneration that I profess for individual liberty, that which I have found in the path I have trod are thorns, that at times have wounded my heart, but they have not turned aside my steps nor confused the conscience of the ruler, since those repressive measures that I have seen the necessity of taking have had entire respect to the supreme duty of preserving public order, a duty that the constitution gives to the executive power.

But these affairs, señores representatives, of which each respective secretary will give you an account, bear the seal of that mildness which has characterized the acts of my administration.

You know that I have begun with good faith a programme of the redemption of this country honorable and laborious, worthy of every sacrifice on the part of the ruler who directs the business; you know that I have broken entirely with old habits that more than the welfare of the nation kept in view the importance of customs, perhaps worthy, but of little moment in comparison with general interest; you know that I have undertaken a great work that has begun to spread civilization through the republic, a work that will interfere with private interests, as always happens with great and worthy enterprises, much more with those interests that affect the capital not only of the natives, but also of foreigners, so that for the prospect of their own advantage they do not hesitate to place obstacles in the way of that of a country that tries to use the advantages of its topographical position and the energy and virtue of its sons.

Add to this the false personal ambition, always awake and never sleeping; the spirit of evil lifting up its head, without considering that its sad triumph will ruin the happiness of the country, will destroy its credit abroad, and will impede the finishing of an affair of such vital importance that instead of arousing opposition demands the assistance of all the good sons of the country.

Desirous, however, that my personality might not be invoked as a pretext by the discontented, in November of the past year I resigned the command into the hands of the first vice-president to exercise the executive power, reserving my position in the army for reasons of well-known public convenience.

Disposed to sustain order in the interior, and to defend the national autonomy, I proclaimed with frankness to the face of the nation my sentiments and propositions.

Very soon the dissensions increased, the lack of concert in the administration was felt, and restlessness of spirit reigned.

I found it necessary for me to take again the reins of government, but resolved to retire after two days, having restored quiet. I called the second vice-president to the chair, and went to the frontier of the country between this republic and Nicaragua.

Señores Representatives, neither the moderation and respectability of the second vice-president, nor the measure that I had taken of departing from the center of the administration could restrain the revolutionary attempts that compelled me again to occupy the presidential chair, and to take measures against the principal authors of these foolish projects, exhibited in open light and confessed to me myself, and against those who were attempting to corrupt some of the worthy chiefs of an army that had given me undoubted proofs of loyalty and adhesion.

I present to you the republic at peace and advancing in the path of progress.

The general prosperity is shown in all and every part.

The rural and city property maintain an increased value that can be only explained by the public wealth and general confidence.

The high price of coffee has compensated in part the failure in the crop, and it is hoped with great probability that the next will be more abundant. I notice only a few difficulties in commercial transactions, on account of the increase of importations, which has produced a sort of money-crisis.

The public instruction is the object of such care as a branch of such importance deserves, and in all the provinces works of utility and beauty are commenced.

The telegraph already connects the capital of the republic with the city of Liberia, and very soon it will be connected with Limon.

The grandest and most important enterprise that has been commenced since our independence until this time without doubt is the construction of the Railroad of the North.

The work already extends over a line of eighty miles, over fifty of which the locomotive runs. The interior traffic between the four principal provinces is carried on with regularity, and is daily increasing.

The inconveniences with which it had to contend have been great, the tropical character of the country, the national and foreign interests that opposed it, the political passions that, with a madness scarcely conceivable, have adopted as their flag opposition to the grandest of national enterprises, the crisis that has been felt in Europe and caused the bonds of all countries to depreciate, and especially those of the republics of Spanish America, and finally, obstacles of all kinds necessary to be undergone with a persevering faith never surpassed.

The government, that has taken no step backward in the path of progress, is far from being dismayed at the innumerable obstacles the construction of the railroad has encountered, concerning the condition of which that secretary will give you full information who has taken under his care the administration of these works, that they may continue without interruption; therefore the necessity has arisen for using economy in public expenses, and increasing the tax on aguardiente and tobacco.

It is very satisfactory to me to announce that the revenues continue increasing so much that they are sufficient to defray the expenses of the administration and to meet its contracts.

May the divine Providence continue to dispense upon Costa Rica the inestimable blessing of peace and interior tranquillity. Under its shade the immense resources of our young country begin to develop themselves as it advances with a firm step to take the position that belongs to it in Spanish America, approaching its beautiful future as it completes the iron road, that way of indefinite progress to the republic. To this end my constant care has been directed, and, in fact, my hopes have gone still further: I am taking steps looking not only to the completion of that line but also to a continuation of it to the Pacific. I have hopes of being able very soon to give you an account of this matter concluded in a manner to give satisfaction to the most exacting expectations; my idea is that the government should cease to be the controller of the work; that the finishing of it should be positively secured, and the republic should be freed from all debt through the means of reasonable concessions.

Believe me, Señores Representatives, I do not entertain any greater ambition than to assure to the republic the termination of a work in which is enshrined its future progress.

Having commenced it, prosecuted it until it has assumed its present condition, to be assured of its completion is the only reward I desire for those efforts that I have expended, of which present and future generations will derive the benefit.

Never have I believed that I possessed the necessary qualifications for filling the position in which the confidence of my country has placed me.

On the other hand, if, during four years, I have been able to acquire any experience in public affairs, this same lapse of time has weakened in turn my moral forces, by the troubles and deceptions inseparable to the exercise of power.

I notice, moreover, there is a social circle discontented with my administration, and while there is no complaint from the immense majority, for the first time I have seen the necessity of speaking to you of the attempts to overturn this government.

In truth, I have not feared that a revolution without a flag could triumph, but would be dissipated before the loyalty and discipline of the army, the good sense of the people, who would have nothing to gain from such a revolution; but permit me to say, with the frankness of a soldier, that this ingratitude has pierced my heart; that the task that I have undertaken demanded that all the men of any merit should afford me assistance, because it tends to the good of the country, and that I have encountered opposition so strong as to become sedition, requiring the employment of measures contrary to my personal character,

Therefore I have determined to resign the command into your august bosom as soon as I can be assured of the completion of the railroad, and I hope this may be done before the close of the session.

The secretaries will respectively give you an account of all the affairs of the administration. There is still much to be done in behalf of this dear country, young in its political existence, but exuberant in its vitality and lavishly endowed by nature. The republic justly has much to expect from you, for you are chosen to accomplish a most exalted mission.

I have finished, honorable representatives.

May divine Providence enlighten you, and, through your efforts, spread its blessings upon Costa Rica.

TOMAS GUARDIA.

Answer of Congress to President.

Señor President of the Republic:

Your presence in the chamber of the national representatives at the solemn moment of its installation, is very satisfactory. It is a testimony of your confidence, and a promise of union and harmony between the powers which constitute the government of the nation.

Your important message was heard with much interest by the congress, giving an idea of the state of prosperity at which the country has arrived, and the hopes that inspire it for the future.

Until congress make the detailed answer to the ideas it contains, I am permitted to express in the name of the congress, that, faithful to its mission, it will not refuse its efforts to the aggrandizement of the country, and to carry forward, by all the means within legitimate functions, the great work with which you have so justly linked your glory and the nation's, its grandeur, as well as all others who march onward to the same end.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, yesterday, I received official intelligence, verbally, * * that the congress of Honduras had adjourned after adopting the three following measures of importance:

- 1st. The confirmation of the provisional presidency of Leiva.
- 2d. The re-adoption of the constitution of 1865.
- 3d. The banishment of the late President Arias for five years.

It seems also * * * that the political turn events have taken in Honduras, within the last few months, has been, if not surprising, at all events, highly unsatisfactory to the government of Guatemala.

The elections for members of Congress resulted in the return of a majority of re-actionists or conservatives, and the consequence has been that many, if not a majority, of the public offices are filled by members of that party. One of the high offices is filled by Colindres, who was declared President of Honduras by the Palacios expedition at the island of Utila last summer.

SIR: I am in receipt of your dispatch No. 139, of the 25th ultimo, relating to the outrage upon Mr. Magee, vice-consul of Great Britain at San José de Guatemala.

Reports had already reached this Department of some such action on the part of the commandante of that place, and an account appeared in the newspapers of yesterday, giving many of the particulars and stating that—

Passengers who were on the steamer Arizona, which was in port when all this was going on, speak very strongly against Mr. James, the United States consul, (consular agent,) for not interfering to save Magee from the cruelty of the commandante.

I will thank you to investigate this matter and inform the Department as to Mr. James's conduct in the affair.

In justice to him, I will state that the first account which reached here was of an entirely different nature, and stated that Mr. James had acted with energy and promptness.

UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, May 29, 1874. (Received July 6.)

SIR: I have the honor to give you the following information in regard to the population and indebtedness of the states of Central America, derived from Mr. R. Toledo, postmaster-general of Guatemala, who was kind enough to furnish the facts from the manuscript copy of an American geography he is just about to publish. As no general census has been taken in any of the states for several years, Mr. Toledo has made up the sum total of the population of each state from the aggregate of the several departments or political subdivisions. From the best estimate I have been able to make his numeration seems to be correct, except as to Salvador, which I think has a population many thousands more than he gives.

Guatemala population.....	1,200,000
Foreign debt.....	$3,000,000 00
Home debt.....	1,363,237 23

SIR: I have the honor now to inclose you the answer of the constituent assembly of Costa Rica to the message of the President, of which a translated copy was sent you with my No. 159.

The short reply forwarded with that dispatch was, it seems, only provisional. This one is published in the official journal of the 16th of May, just received.

* * * * *

The terms which the assembly employs in regard to the revolutionary attempts to overthrow the government of President Guardia might be considered sufficiently mild in any country.

When they are used by a constituent assembly which is supposed to be indebted for its existence to the will of the executive chief rather than that of the people, they seem to indicate a moderation of temper.

* * * * *

On page 3 you will notice the expressions used with reference to "the basis of a future union in one single people" of the Central American States.

This idea of the eventual union of the five states under one government, is put forward in nearly all of the public documents of these countries ; but it is, in my opinion, a consummation so remote that no statesman in Central America contemplates its realization during his life-time. My reasons for entertaining this opinion will be set forth in a separate dispatch.

[Inclosure—Translation.]

Constitutional Congress to the Most Excellent Señor General, President of the Republic :

The Constitutional Congress, convened in its regular meeting, has heard with deep interest the message you delivered on the solemn occasion of the opening of its session.

Your presence on that occasion was very flattering.

Although the constitution does not expressly decree this, it is very suitable that when the national representation is installed, at a time determined by law, the chief of the nation should appear in its bosom as a proof of mutual faith and a sign of harmony between the constitutional powers.

Not without reason have you expressed a hope that the deputies that form this body are penetrated by the importance of the delicate mission which the people have intrusted to them, and that they will be equal to the necessities of the country.

They, as well as yourself, with their hearts full of faith in the future, come disposed to labor for the prosperity of the people and the aggrandizement of the nation which they represent.

The Congress is pleased that your administration has maintained and cultivated relations with foreign nations without anything happening to disturb the harmony.

It is not less a matter for congratulation that the momentary misunderstanding between the sister republics has disappeared.

Those family ties, and the union of interests that bind them to Costa Rica, are powerful motives that ought to influence the spirit of the governments that rule them to allay all cause of misunderstandings, and to prevent the evil suggestions of those who, in an evil hour, think that to establish their ideas or their principles, or perhaps to satisfy their ambition, it is lawful to steep the soil of Central America with the blood of her sons shed in fratricidal strife. You do well in showing by acts the sentiments of the fraternity which animate you, and in taking advantage of opportunities of cementing peace among the nations of our family, and of establishing the basis of a future union in one single people.

It is very painful that the attempts of partisans have compelled you to use measures of repression to preserve the public order.

The Congress does not see, without extreme pain, these revolutionary attempts so foreign to the habits of order which characterize the Costa Ricans, and to which they owe their prosperity and aggrandizement. It is to be hoped that these parties, taught by the sad effects of the revolutions that in other parts have paralyzed progress, impeded work, annihilated industry, and demoralized the people, may abstain from excesses that endanger public tranquillity, and that, guided by sentiments of true patriotism, they may limit their actions within the sphere of strict legality.

Congress has, from the beginning, given its good-will to the grand work (that affords you the glory of undertaking it) of opening communication with the Atlantic. With reason you have rested your glory on this work, and you have labored with zeal to assure its completion. The Congress also recognizes its immense importance, and will continue to afford it all the attention which it merits.

Señor President, be assured that the members that compose the Constitutional Congress come with the sincere intention to respond worthily to the confidence of the people ; they, in the fulfilling of their delicate duties, will endeavor to be inspired with sentiments of the purest patriotism ; and with the interests of the nation.

Proceed, then, in this assurance ; justice will be the rule of our conduct, and the progress and advancement of our country the end to which our resolutions will tend ; so that your endeavors and ours, emanating from the same source and directed to the same object, will unite in advancing the great interests of the nation.

Congress will attentively hear the report of the secretary of state, and will examine it without passion or prejudice. Their judgment will be the testimony of their consciences, and not the echo of their passions.

Meanwhile the representatives of the nation congratulate you on the state of progress in which the republic finds itself in every branch of its administration, and give heartfelt thanks to divine Providence for the bounties which He has so abundantly showered upon us from His beneficent hand, and we ask the continuance of the same for you and for us.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 8, 1874.

SIR: Your No. 146 (bis) of the date of May 4 is received, and in a large degree anticipates the information asked in my No. 76, of the 26th day of May last.

The transaction to which it refers is among the most remarkable outrages upon the official representative of a foreign government of modern times, and would seem to be accounted for only upon the presumption that the perpetrator of the outrage was crazy. This presumption seems to be strengthened by the course of Mr. James at the time, and by the tenor and the conclusions of the interview between the British chargé and the minister of foreign affairs of Guatemala.

Of the agreement reached by these two officials it is not my purpose to enter into any discussion; it is a matter between those two states. But every civilized power is interested to denounce such acts as were committed and to watch the execution of the promises to bring the offender to justice.

You will therefore, without obtrusive interference, let it be known to the authorities of Guatemala that your Government feels that the civilization of the age and the immunity which the intercourse of governments exacts for their representatives in other lands, entitle it to expect the stern visitation of the law upon the perpetrator of the violence committed upon a consular representative of a government in treaty relations with Guatemala. And you will carefully report the result of any proceedings against the offending commandante.

Your own conduct at the time of the occurrence appears to have been prompt and discreet.

Mr. Magee's letter to Mr. James is a warm tribute to his course, and, in connection with Mr. James's own account of the affair, shows the latter to have acted efficiently and with good intents. But it is to be regretted that Mr. James should, even from a generous impulse, have been led into offering the protection of the American flag to one fresh from the perpetration of such a flagrant and brutal outrage as that of Commandante Gonzalez.

The American flag does not float at home for the protection from justice of villains and outlaws, and it should not abroad be tendered by the representatives of the Government for that purpose to those who are flying from the just wrath of outraged law and decency.

* * * * *

The Congress of the United States decided to reduce to one the five legations accredited to the governments of the Central American republics. In consequence of this decision Señor Don Jacob Blair, who was minister to this republic, presented on the 30th of June of last year his letter of withdrawal.

On the 13th of August of the same year the Señor Don George Williamson presented to the President of Costa Rica the credentials that accredited him as United States minister resident at Central America. Ever since he has been recognized in this character.

So it is in moments of sad disagreement the chief of Costa Rica conceived serious fears of a rupture between Costa Rica and her sisters, and in the bottom of his heart seriously regretted the necessity in which he believed he would find himself of seeing his country involved in a struggle of brothers, sad in its effects and barren in its results.

So it was that he eagerly seized upon the idea conceived by Señors Williamson and Corbett, the ministers of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty, of a meeting of the five Presidents of Central America for treating of general affairs and fixing the basis of a solid and lasting peace between the Central American republics until that epoch shall arrive, marked in the destinies of these people by a complete union of all in one single nationality.

Circumstances that belong only to the private affairs of some of these states have postponed indefinitely this meeting for consulting concerning the interest of all. Notwithstanding this disappointment the government hopes that the peace will not again be disturbed, and that the ties of family that unite us to our sisters, far from being weakened, will be strengthened by the blessing of internal peace which each State enjoys, and by the deeply-grounded sentiment of concord and fraternity that exists between the people.

No. 182.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, June 24, 1874. (Received August 12.)

SIR: Referring to the last paragraph of my No. 167, I have the honor to lay before you the facts and reasons which my present information suggests to be the chief obstacles to a union of the Central American states under one government.

1. The memories of the sanguinary struggles that occurred on account of the attempted federal union from the year 1822 until the execution of Morazan in the plaza of San José, Costa Rica, on the 15th of September, 1842, are still quite fresh in the minds of the people. The immense loss of life, destruction of property, paralysis of commerce and agriculture and all progress, that befell Central America during the twenty years of that protracted contest, may be considered as a warning against a future attempt.

2. The debt incurred during the existence of the federal union has been a thorn in the side of all the states. The practical repudiation of their portion of it has been a stigma upon the credit of several of them. The payment of their portion by others has imposed a heavy burden upon the people.

3. No one who has not traveled through these States can realize the immense amount of local prejudice that exists; prejudices that are not based upon conflicts or diversity of interest, but seemingly the result of traditional antipathies. The antagonism of Leon and Grenada in Nicaragua caused the removal of the seat of government to a half-way place, Managua, at the time an Indian village.

4. No state seems to accord to any other state a priority in anything. My experience has taught me to be extremely careful not to institute comparisons.

5. The populations are by no means homogeneous in any one state, and in the five states are about as heterogeneous as possible, shading from the fair-haired and blue-eyed Saxon to the black skin of the Carib.

6. There is no apparent identity of interest among the states, although, being almost exclusively agricultural, and engaged in the production of the same products, there is no obvious reason why there should be any diversity.

7. Since the death of Ex-President Cabañas, of Honduras, there has been no prominent man in Central America who has ventured to make a public issue upon the question of federation. If there are really political parties in Central America, neither one of them has embodied in its platform now, the enunciation of the principle that a federal union of the states is either practicable or desirable. If that principle ever was a cardinal one of the liberal party, it has become obsolete, and in my judgment now has quite as many advocates among those who are called serviles or re-actionists as among those termed liberals.

The pacts of Nacaomi, Chinandiga, San Miguel, and La Union, (the last as late as February 17, 1872; see Foreign Relations, 1871, p. 520,) are indications that the idea of unity has had, and probably may now have, advocates. The frequent mention of the ultimate union of the states in the papers of public men might induce a stranger to suppose there exists some popular sentiment in its favor.

Such expressions are used, I imagine, to round periods, pretty much after the fashion with which similar phrases are adopted in reference to the Utopian idea of a unity of the so-called Latin republics of America.

8. The difficulty of inter-communication presents an almost insurmountable barrier to a union.

The masses of the people of the several states know nothing of their neighbors. They have never seen any of them, except, perhaps, on the sea-coast; or a few peddlers; or as soldiers, carrying death and ruin along with their victorious banners. It is easier to make a trip from New York to Constantinople and back than from Guatemala to San José, or Costa Rica, by land, and the former can be accomplished in a shorter time. The communications by sea are also slow, owing to the fact that all the capitals are in the interior. Guatemala and Salvador are the only two states connected by telegraph, and that has been accomplished within the last few days. This same difficulty will stand in the way at all times, to a great degree, because the broken character of the country will always prevent the construction of continuous lines of railway.

9. Costa Rica, if I am not misinformed, historically as well as presently, has no disposition to join the other states in a federal union. Her traditional policy seems to be that of isolation, to as great an extent as consistent with the preservation of good relations. The causes for this are too numerous to discuss in this dispatch, and I content myself by stating my belief of the fact.

I have thus presented to you, as briefly as possible, the facts and reasons upon which the opinion is based, that a federal union of the Central American states is not likely to occur for many years, and is even doubtful altogether.

I have no information that warrants the opinion that any foreign power in late years has intrigued to prevent such a union. The latest diplomatic interference is said to have been made by the French chargés d'affaires during the time of the French occupation of Mexico. So far as it has been possible for me to inform myself on the subject, I believe the foreign powers are content at present to make the most they can commercially out of Central America, and to assent to a prevailing idea in this quarter that there is a "manifest destiny" which sooner or later will make the Central American states, as a whole or separately, members of the American Union.

No. 188.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, July 10, 1874. (Received August 19.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the official journal of to-day contains an account of an affair which occurred on the 28th and 29th of June, in the department of San Marcos, of Guatemala, which lies next to Soconusco, Mexico, that seems to be of sufficient moment to report.

The statement of the affair is substantially as follows: On the 28th of June, as a force of one hundred and fifty infantry and fifty cavalry crossed the frontier of Guatemala, at a village called Malacatan, and, having surprised the small garrison there, completely routed and dispersed it, after killing the commandante and another person.

It seems, without halting long, they marched on in the direction of San Marcos, and reached that night a town called Ixtepeque.

Here they were attacked on the morning of the 29th by a Guatemala force of seventy men, and in turn completely routed and dispersed, after a fight of two hours.

The Guatemalan commander of the force reports that, without the loss of a man, he killed forty of the enemy and captured about the same number. Among the latter is the chief of the expedition. He also reports the capture of a number of arms, and that the remainder of the invading force is dispersed through the mountains.

This report, the minister of war tells me, he has good reason to believe to be true. I confess that, until he so assured me, I was almost incredulous enough to suspect it might be a canard.

The noteworthy feature of the affair is that the invading force was composed almost exclusively of regular Mexican soldiers, who composed a part of the garrison of Tapachula, in the Mexican department of Soconusco. They were in the employment of a Spaniard named José Garcia, a refugee from this city.

The minister of war and of foreign affairs both tell me they do not believe that the reactionary party in Guatemala had any connection with the affair. Their present explanation of its origin is about as follows: That the leaders of the expedition, Garcia, Coyote, and others, who had been former military associates of President Barrios in the revolution of 1871, believing that they had been badly treated by Barrios, and thinking the present a favorable time to overthrow his government and obtain their revenge, employed or hired the Mexican troops.

They express themselves as fully satisfied the Mexican authorities had no hand in the matter.

This would seem to be correct, because the Mexican civil officer at Tapachula gave notice of the invasion, and a Mexican officer, with about two hundred men, is reported on the frontier for the purpose of assisting in the capture of the fugitives.

It is, however, altogether an inexplicable affair to me at present. I will report further if I can obtain reliable information.

I am inclined to the opinion that the invasion was made with the knowledge and expected co-operation of the disaffected parties in Guatemala, who furnished the means, and that treachery has been the cause of the total defeat of their plans.

No. 194.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, July 27, 1874. (Received September 9.)

SIR: Referring to your instruction No. 79, I have the honor to inform you, that yesterday afternoon the council of war, composed of the chief officers of the army of Guatemala, over which Ex-President Grenados presided, concluded the trial of Gonzales and his confederate, Bulnes. The sentence of the court was, that the former should be degraded from his rank, be forever prohibited from holding any office of honor or profit in Guatemala, and be imprisoned for five years. The latter's sentence was the same in all respects, except that he is imprisoned for two years. Both have appealed to the supreme court of war, which is a civil tribunal for the final trial of military cases, and is composed of the same judges who constitute the supreme court of justice; so I am informed by the prime minister.

As instructed by you, I communicated both to the minister of foreign affairs and to the prime minister that the Government of the United States felt "that the civilization of the age, and the immunity which the intercourse of governments exacts for their representatives in other lands," gave it the right to expect the stern visitation of the law upon the perpetrators of the outrage upon Vice-Consul Magee. Both of them professed to receive the declaration as an evidence of the friendly interest which the United States takes in the welfare of Guatemala.

To-day the prime minister told me he thought the sentence of the court was too lenient as to Gonzalez. He also stated the supreme court of war had the right to change the sentence and increase the punishment, and that the government would use its influence to have it do so. It is perhaps a coincidence that no steps (so far as I can learn) were taken to bring Gonzalez to trial until it became known the British dispatch war steamer Petrel had landed at San José with dispatches for the English chargé, and that the British Pacific squadron had been ordered to rendezvous at Panama.

The British chargé is very indignant at the sentence of the court, and has expressed to me and the French chargé his determination to notify the government of Guatemala that he considers the protocol annulled. He takes the ground that the punishment is totally inadequate to the offense, and that the government of Guatemala has shown its mala fides by permitting the smallest punishment to be imposed upon the accused that the law allows.

* * * * *

He says, moreover, that such a punishment in Guatemala would be a farce, and that even if the supreme court does not reverse the sentence, or the president pardon the criminals in a few months, they will become heroes, instead of being degraded, in the eyes of the public.

In this opinion I fully concur with him. In any country where there are guarantees that the punishment would be inflicted according to the sentence, it would seem to be sufficiently heavy.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the latest information from Nicaragua, through Mr. I. A. Gauffrau, acting consul at San Juan del Sur, justifies the apprehension that a revolution in that state is very probable.

There is great excitement about the election of President in October.

* * * * *

In my No. 174 I had the honor to inform you that General Chamorro was the candidate who had the support of the government. He is still so, according to the latest information.

An event has recently occurred in Leon, of Nicaragua, which appears to show the contempt or defiance of the authority of the President which not uncommonly precedes revolutions in these states.

A decree, of which a translated copy is herewith inclosed was issued by the President, dated the 25th of June, calling to the exercise of the executive power General Don Joaquin Zavalla. He states in the preamble his reasons are of a domestic nature, and also that he is authorized by the 51st article of the constitution.

When the decree was served upon General Zavalla he declined to obey, alleging he had a sick family that required all his care.

A guard was put at his door, and a fine of one hundred dollars per hour for every hour he continued to decline obedience was assessed against him by the government.

He still continued contumacious, and a short time after President Quadra revoked the decree and resumed the executive power. I have no copy of the last decree.

This event, I am informed, increased the excitement in Nicaragua.

General Zavalla was supposed to be the friend of General Chamorro, the government candidate for the presidency.

* * * * *

General Zavalla's prudence and reputed courage, as well as devotion to the fortunes of General Chamorro, were thought by the friends of the latter to be necessary to success.

It is impossible to surmise what were General Zavalla's real motives for declining to obey the decree, but the reason assigned publicly is that he is a friend of General Chamorro, and that he wishes to use all his influence in his behalf, which he could not have done with honor if he had accepted the executive office. A highly honorable motive, I would say.

This event is reported to indicate the state of feeling in Nicaragua at the present time, and to enable you to judge of the probable correctness of my opinion that a revolution there is very probable.

SEÑOR: The supreme executive power has been pleased to issue the following decree:

The President of the republic of Nicaragua undergoing grave domestic troubles that require all his care, and not wishing for this cause to check the course of numerous general and particular affairs that are pending the consideration of the government and need a careful attention, using the power that article 51 of the constitution confers, decrees:

ARTICLE 1. Señor Senator-General Don Joaquin Zavalla be called to the exercise of the executive power, who will immediately enter upon the duties of the office.

ART. 2. The señor minister is charged with the fulfillment of the present decree, and of communicating it to whom it may concern.

No. 210.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, August 11, 1874. (Received Sept. 23.)

SIR: The supreme court of war has announced its decision in the cases of Gonzalez and Bulnes, the perpetrators of the outrage upon the British vice-consul, Magee.

The sentence in the case of Gonzalez is, in all respects, like that of which you were informed in my dispatch No. 194, except the punishment is increased from five to ten years. The latter, Bulnes, is pronounced guilty of a misdemeanor, and is deprived of his right to hold any office of trust or profit under the government of Guatemala, but the judgment of imprisonment awarded against him by the council of war is reversed, and he is restored to his liberty.

The minister of foreign affairs now tells me the cases must be finally tried before the supreme court of justice. The minister of war had previously informed me (as I understood him) that the decision of the supreme court of war was final.

There seems to be a general feeling of indignation among foreigners at the release of Bulnes. He was the deliberate actor in the outrage, who, with his own hands, several hours in advance, made ready the sticks with which Magee was so barbarously beaten.

His boasts that his influence with Prime Minister Samayoa was a perfect shield to himself and Gonzalez against any punishment for what they might do were made publicly at San José, both before and after the outrage.

He instigated the drunken madman, Gonzalez, to commit the atrocious act, and morally is the guiltier of the two. He is to go "scot free," except that for the present he is deprived of the right to hold any office of trust or profit in Guatemala.

* * * * *

The British chargé told me he had taken no steps yet to declare the protocol annulled, but that he had written to the government this morning protesting against the release of Bulnes, and requesting that his case be prosecuted rigorously. He says if this is not done he will retire his legation and turn over the further management of the affair to the admiral of the British fleet, which is hourly expected at San José.

Extracts from "El Progreso," of Guatemala.—Translation.

Señor Soto to Señor P. Leiva.

GUATEMALA, May 15, 1874.

MY ESTEEMED FRIEND: With pleasure I begin this letter, by congratulating you upon the confirmation that the Congress has given to your appointment as provisional President of Honduras. Receive, then, my sincere good wishes. Señor President Barrios has directed that my cousin-german, Don Ramon Rosa, proceed to your capital on a confidential mission that he has conferred on him near you, and I take this opportunity of presenting Rosa to you as a member of my family, and of recommending him to your friendship.

Two steamers since I wrote to you concerning the business that has given rise to this mission of Señor Rosa's, and at present I will allow myself to speak fully, relying on the conviction I have of the rectitude of your intentions, your honor, and patriotism.

Public opinion already, by words and in print, has pronounced against the last events that have transpired in Honduras; that is, the fall of the government of Arias, by the allied forces of Guatemala and Salvador, and especially the capture of Amapala.

You understand perfectly the reasons for addressing to Señor Arias the paper signed by the two Presidents of the allied republics, which Señor General Gonzalez has had published. In that paper Señor Arias was invited to lay down the command and to call a popular election. In it the two Presidents assured Señor Arias that not only his life and liberty should be guaranteed, but that they would use all of their influence that the consideration due to his high character and personal merits should be respected and guarded. When Señor Arias surrendered in the Plaza of Comayagua, the article of surrender signed by the Generals Espinoza, Solares, and Lopez, guaranteed alike to Señor Arias, in the most solemn manner, his liberty and his life, and the same to his cabinet. With these antecedents it could not appear but strange that Ex-President Arias and his minister, del Cid, have been imprisoned, and it is still more strange that the latest information is that the Congress of that country is going to try Arias and submit his case to the common tribunals.

I, on seeing the names of the deputies that assembled at the installation of the national convention, have found an explanation of these acts.

There appear, in the first and greater part, true allies of the ultra-conservative party, and even those who composed the government of Utila! It is certainly not strange, then, that the national convention, so formed, pardoned Medina, and even applauded him, and condemned Arias to perpetual exile or death.

I do not believe that these individuals are competent judges for trying the political conduct either of the former, Medina, or of the latter, Arias.

In respect to Medina, the majority of them were partial to him, and even his accomplices; in respect to Arias, the whole of them were his personal and violent enemies.

The vote, then, of this grand jury cannot be the expression of justice. At present I cannot conceive the right they have of trying Arias. As dictator, the public opinion of his country is his only judge, and as chief of a nation who has surrendered in virtue of the solemn agreement which the generals-in-chief of the forces of Honduras, Salvador, and Guatemala signed, an agreement in which was guaranteed the life of President Arias and his ministers, there is not any judge competent to try them, for the law of nations places them entirely beyond all jurisdiction, and accords them, as voluntary prisoners of war, immunity of life and property and a full guarantee of their liberty.

The government of Guatemala, since it feels it is compromised by itself and its general-in-chief to consider what is due to Señor Arias, cannot see with criminal indifference the evil course that is pursued against one of the most sincere liberals of Central America, who has afforded such valuable service to the cause of the revolution, and has always been their friend and ally.

I firmly believe that the confidential mission which Señor Rosa undertakes to you will be appreciated at its true value, on account of the motives that cause it, motives which I do not doubt will find a warm response in your noble and patriotic breast.

I believe, moreover, that this mission will free you from the exigencies and intrigues of the enemies of Señor Arias, who wish to cause your ruin; because you, working in conformity with the agreement and for the sake of a friendly government which asks the liberty of Señor Arias, free yourself from the charge and responsibilities these bitter political cliques wish to impose upon you.

Frankly, my friend, I do not believe, nor do I wish to believe, that you have taken part in the disgraceful events that have been endured by and threaten Señor Arias. Your high and noble spirit will always contradict even the suspicion that you can have taken part in them. Therefore, as I have shown you before this, and in the present letter, arise the sympathy and interest I have for you personally and for your government. I do not wish that your well-merited reputation should be diminished, or that they should say of you that when in power he has done the same thing he condemned in his predecessor.

Will you, then, receive my thoughts with kindness, and, on my recommendation, the Señor Rosa as true and sincere a friend as,

Your attentive servant,

MARCO A. SOTO.

Señor Leiva to Señor Soto.

COMAYAGUA, July 8, 1874.

MY ESTEEMED FRIEND: In the 25th number of the El Porvenir de Nicaragua was published a letter dated May 15, which it appears you sent to me by Señor Lic^{do} Rosa, which I did not receive, as the said señor returned from the journey when he found the mission was unnecessary.

A certain person, whose name is unknown to me, has procured its publication, asserting, with evil intent, that a copy had been sent from this capital.

You, to whom the Señor Rosa ought to have returned the original, will know if he has consented to the aforementioned publication; and if he has not, can find who the person is who has abused his confidence. However, in regard to the contents of said letter, it is satisfactory to me to believe that, by the facts, you will be convinced that the convention was not, as some suppose, an enraged body, with the sword of vengeance raised, and that, in respect to myself, I was not deceived in thinking myself of sufficient strength of will to be generous to the prisoner Arias, raising my sentiments above every miserable passion. I interested myself in his favor, even opposing public opinion, which was averse to him. The exile to which he has been condemned by the convention he would have had to endure of his own accord, as he could not have resided without danger in the country until some time had elapsed. By reason of this same decision, the judge of his conduct, it was necessary to order his detention, modifying the agreement of the surrender, which I ought to approve, as commanding general of the republic, under whose orders were the generals of the besieging forces.

There is an interest on the part of some false liberals of this republic to discredit my government, and for that purpose they write injurious falsehoods, which they publish in the El Porvenir de Nicaragua, a periodical that, with the stupidity of Pasquino, publishes everything. But I look with contempt on its calumnies, trusting in the good sense of the worthy Hondurans, who are the witnesses of my conduct favorable to the people who have trusted me with their destinies.

I have proposed to give freedom to liberal principles in Honduras, beginning by guaranteeing the free use of the right of suffrage, and through this there have appeared in the convention men of different political opinions; and on this account I use in the administration of public affairs citizens indiscriminately from parties that call themselves liberals or conservatives, without declaring myself the chief of either, and so far have had no cause to repent of pursuing such a course. If this course is approved by my fellow-citizens, if these same parties limit their desire for exclusiveness, there will result the maintenance of the peace of the republic, which is what I most earnestly desire. If I am deceived, and the result of this purely national course does not answer my hopes, and new disturbances arise in an evil hour to oppose the authors of these, I will have the sad reproach of knowing that in my country there are still men unworthy of the liberty the existing government offers to all.

I will write to you by the following mail, meanwhile awaiting your orders.

I am, your obedient servant,

PONCIANO LEIVA.

No. 214.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, August 17, 1874. (Received September 23.)

SIR: I have the honor to state that, if you think it desirable, I would like to furnish you as full information as I may be able to obtain relative to the commerce, navigation, agriculture, and industrial arts of Central America, and also to the laws that affect any of our people coming here or having commercial relations with this country.

It has occurred to me such knowledge might prove serviceable to our country, and that in transmitting it (if successful) I would be fulfilling in part the duties of the mission.

Without any intention to censure directly or impliedly any of the ministers to the Central states heretofore, I beg leave to say that an inspection of their correspondence indicates their attention was not much given to such subjects.

You are aware that in these countries there are no statistical tables collected or published by the governments, and that they have the misfortune not to have newspapers or scientific societies which make it a business to collect facts relating to the public life of the state.

In order to make the effort to obtain the information, it appears (from my construction of your instruction No. 8,) to be necessary to obtain your permission to correspond officially on these subjects with the several governments of Guatemala, Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua, and also with that of Costa Rica, if relations should be restored with that state.

I beg to present an illustration of a beneficial effect that might accrue from obtaining the kind of information alluded to. I am convinced, from unofficial sources, the export and import duties in most, if not all, of these states are so levied as to be prejudicial to our commerce. It may be this has resulted, in a measure, from the advice of some of our commercial rivals.

If the official data could be obtained, it seems it ought not to be difficult to point out to these governments how unjustly they discriminate against the commerce of the United States.

They might be shown how heavy are the duties on those articles we can undoubtedly furnish more cheaply than other nations, such as flour, bacon, lard, petroleum-oils, patent medicines; canned fish, oysters, meats, and fruits; California wines and liquors, and other articles I cannot at the moment recall.

A knowledge of the tariff-laws of the several Central American states would seem to be useful, if not quite necessary, in the negotiation of future treaties. It is hoped you will allow me to present another illustration of the necessity of official correspondence in connection with the subject of commerce. There being no consuls at the seats of government of Honduras and Nicaragua, annual official statements of exports and imports cannot be obtained without incurring an obligation to the courtesy of some private citizen, which, in my judgment, ought always to be avoided by a minister if possible.

It seems desirable that our Government should be well informed in regard to the supply of agricultural and natural products of these countries, which we import and consume or manufacture largely, particularly coffee, cochineal, indigo, India rubber, sarsaparilla, and sugar or muscovado.

A knowledge of the laws that affect our citizens residing here or who may choose to come here would seem to be worthy of acquisition.

I regret to trouble you with this long dispatch, but am induced to do so from my anxiety to infringe in no manner the rules of the Department, and to conform strictly to the interpretation put upon your instruction No. 81.

No. 220.] UNITED STATES LEGATION IN CENTRAL AMERICA,
Guatemala, August 21, 1874. (Received Sept. 23.)

SIR: I have the honor to report that the arrangement for the settlement of the questions between Great Britain and Guatemala which grew out of the outrage upon Vice-Consul Magee at the port of San José, on the 24th of April last, has been completed. My information is derived from the British chargé d'affaires and from the minister of foreign affairs of Guatemala.

The supreme court of justice announced its sentence yesterday in the cases of Gonzalez and Bulnes. I am assured it is final.

In my No. 210 I reported to you the decision of the supreme court of war, by which Bulnes was acquitted. That decision has been reversed by the supreme court of justice. The sentence now is, in the case of Gonzalez, that he be destituted of his rank and sentenced to close confinement for ten years in the fortress of San Felipe, and be forever prohibited from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the government of Guatemala.

I take occasion to remark, on this sentence, that destitution of rank here is quite different from degradation from rank. The former is an act consummated by the decree of the court or the mandate of the President. In the latter the officer who is to be punished is degraded in some public place, in the presence of his comrades and voluntary spectators, in the most severe and ceremonious manner.

I also beg leave to say the fortress of San Felipe is an unfinished and partly demolished old Spanish fort, located just where the gulf or lake of Dulce begins to discharge itself through the river Dulce into the Gulf Amatique, on the Caribbean or north side of Guatemala. Having been through this ruin, I would pronounce it anything but a safe place for a prisoner who wished to escape.

The sentence of the court in the case of Bulnes is, that he shall be imprisoned for three years and be forever deprived of the right of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the government of Guatemala.

The British chargé having decided that the foregoing sentences were unsatisfactory, demanded, under special instruction, that the government of Guatemala should pay $50,000, and that a salute of twenty-one guns should be fired to the British flag at San José by the troops of Guatemala, under the immediate command of the military officer of the highest rank in the state, and in the presence of himself, the British admiral, and such of the diplomatic corps as he might invite to be present. To these terms the government of Guatemala acceded yesterday, as I am informed by the British chargé and the prime minister and the minister of foreign affairs.

The money is to be paid on the day the salute is fired. That day is not yet agreed upon, but the 30th or 31st has been indicated.

The only difference between the statements of the two parties as to the arrangement is, that the Guatemalan officials state the government reserves the right to present "justifications" of its course to the British government, and to reclaim the $50,000 if that government should become convinced at any future time it was wrong in requiring its payment.

The British chargé says there is no reservation of any kind whatever, and that the settlement is either final and conclusive of the whole matter, or it is of no effect whatever.

I anticipate there will be no further serious trouble or correspondence about this subject.

I have, &c.,

LEGATION OF GUATEMALA,

New York, August 30, 1873. (Received Sept. 5.)

SIR: The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of Guatemala, by order of his government, has the honor to inform his excellency the Secretary of Foreign Relations of the United States that Don Enrique Palacios and other Central American emigrants were engaged for some time at Aspinwall in preparing an armed expedition for the purpose of invading the republics of Guatemala, Salvador, and Honduras, and of reviving the civil war which has scarcely come to an end. With this design, they purchased the steamer General Sherman, which was sailing under the United States flag, equipped it with war material, embarked, and set sail for Belize, in order to get arms which they had deposited there. The governor of the colony, however, having been informed of the revolutionary designs of Palacios and his companions, forbade the shipment of the arms; whereupon they sailed for the ports of Truxillo and Omoa, in Honduras.

The government of the undersigned has learned with regret that the aforesaid steamer left the port of Aspinwall, raising the flag of the United States, and that, although the revolutionists publicly announced through the press that their object was to overthrow the order established in three of the republics of Central America, the consuls or consular agents of the United States at Aspinwall, Belize, and other ports in Honduras made no effort to prevent the American flag from being used to protect this unlawful enterprise.

The government of Guatemala, trusting to the high sense of justice of that of the United States, and to the friendship and harmony which happily exist between the two nations, hopes that your excellency's government, having been made aware of the above facts, will be pleased to issue orders for the pursuit and apprehension of the steamer General Sherman, and to instruct the consuls and agents of the United States not to permit a filibustering expedition, whose object is to disturb the peace of Central America, to be protected by the flag of a friendly nation.

I avail, &c.,

VICENTE DARDON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 9, 1873.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the 30th ultimo, addressed to this Department by Mr. Dardon, minister plenipotentiary of Guatemala, representing that Don Henry Palacios and other emigrants from Central America, who for some time past had been preparing at Colon or Aspinwall an armed expedition to invade the republics of Guatemala, Salvador, and Honduras, had for that purpose bought the steamer General Sherman, which was under the flag of the United States, had placed munitions of war on board of her, and, embarking in her, had proceeded to Belize to receive arms which they had lodged there.

Mr. Dardon complains that, although the object of the expedition adverted to was notorious, the consuls or consular agents of the United States at Aspinwall, Belize, and the ports of Honduras opposed no obstacle to the shielding of the illegal enterprise by the American flag.

Mr. Dardon consequently expresses, on behalf of his government, that the Government of the United States will issue orders for the pursuit and capture of the General Sherman, and that their consuls and agents will be instructed not to allow a filibustering expedition to disturb the peace of Central America.

In reply, the undersigned has the honor to express his regret that any hostile expedition should have been set on foot under the flag of the United States for the purpose of invading the territories of friendly states. If, however, as Mr. Dardon alleges, the General Sherman has been sold to foreigners, this Government is no longer responsible for her acts. Though the sale deprived her of the right to fly the flag of the United States, Mr. Dardon is probably aware that, in time of actual or threatened hostilities, it is a common occurrence for such a right to be assumed as a stratagem, and the undersigned is aware of no penalty for such an assumption.

The legislation of the United States may be regarded as ample for the punishment of their citizens who, even without their jurisdiction, may take part in any hostile expedition against a country with which their government may be at peace. If Mr. Dardon or his government believes that any such citizens have been engaged in such an enterprise from or at either of the points named in his note, prosecutions against them will be instituted when the proper proof of their wrong-doing shall have been produced to competent judicial authority. In regard to the instructions to consular officers requested by Mr. Dardon, that gentleman must be aware that, within the territory of another country, they have no other authority than such as may be derived from treaty and public law, and, so far as the undersigned is aware, there is no provision of either by which they are authorized even to attempt to arrest an expedition against a neutral power in a vessel belonging to foreigners.

If this Government had reason to believe that, since her sale, as above mentioned, the General Sherman had been guilty of acts of piracy on the high seas, it would direct its naval commanders to arrest her therefor. But as even Mr. Dardon does not allege that any such acts have been or are likely to be committed, it is deemed most advisable to abstain at present from giving any such orders.

The information upon this subject conveyed in Mr. Dardon's note and received from other sources is not as full as is desired. Measures have been adopted toward supplying deficiencies. When that shall have been done, there may be occasion again to address Mr. Dardon in regard to it.

LEGATION OF GUATEMALA IN THE UNITED STATES,
No. 13 SOUTH WILLIAM STREET, NEW YORK,
November 22, 1873. (Received Nov. 26.)

The undersigned, minister of Guatemala and Salvador, has the honor to inform the honorable Secretary of State of the United States that the steamer Colon, which arrived in this port on the 17th instant, from Aspinwall, brought two hundred and fifty-eight cases of arms and munitions of war, sent by Don Enrique Palacios, the leader of the filibustering expedition against the republics of Guatemala, Salvador, and Honduras, and consigned to Messrs. Ribon & Muñoz, of this city, to be kept subject to his order. These arms and munitions were removed from on board of the steamer General Sherman when the authorities of the republic of Colombia were about to embargo them at the request of the consul of Guatemala at Aspinwall, and Mr. Palacios, having no other means of preventing them from being embargoed, has sent them to this city, in order to have them ready for a fresh expedition against those republics. As Messrs. Ribon & Muñoz, however, are unwilling to receive this consignment, the articles have been left at the custom-house, subject to the order of the sender, as those gentlemen have informed the undersigned.

Palacios is a citizen of Guatemala, who, a few months since, in conjunction with other Central Americans, organized a filibustering expedition, with the design of subverting public order in Guatemala, Salvador, and Honduras, as the undersigned has had on a previous occasion the honor to inform the honorable Secretary of State. The filibusters, having been defeated by the government of Guatemala, re-embarked on board of the steamer General Sherman, and returned to Aspinwall, for the purpose of procuring means to continue in their illegal enterprise. Palacios, however, not thinking that the arms which he had brought from Central America were safe there, has shipped them to this city, and the undersigned, desiring to prevent these arms and munitions of war, which are now stored in the New York custom-house, from being removed therefrom before it shall have been shown before a competent court that they are a lawful prize, begs the honorable Secretary of State to be pleased to give the necessary orders, to the end that the custom-house of this city may hold the articles aforesaid until the competent authorities shall have rendered a decision.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 15, 1874.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to state that the note of Mr. Dardon, minister of Guatemala and Salvador, of the 22d of November last, reached here in due season, but having accidentally been mislaid, this alone has occasioned the delay of an acknowledgment of its receipt.

That paper represents that the steamer Colon, which arrived at New York on the 17th of November, brought a number of cases of arms and munitions of war, sent by Don Enrique Palacios, and that, as their consignees declined to receive them, they remain at the custom-house, subject, as is supposed, to the order of the sender. Mr. Dardon consequently requests that the articles referred to may be detained until a competent court shall determine that they are a lawful prize.

In reply, the undersigned has the honor to state that, without questioning the antecedents which Mr. Dardon mentions in regard to the articles adverted to, it is presumed they were imported into the United States in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as other merchandise of a similar character. If the requirements of the law shall have been fulfilled in regard to them, there is no executive authority which can properly interfere with the claim of the rightful owner. They cannot be detained contrary to his pleasure, except by order of a court of justice, and during the pendency of any suit which may be brought in respect to them, if such order should so require.

LEGATION OF NICARAGUA IN THE U. S. OF AMERICA,
Washington, September 14, 1874. (Received Sept. 14.)

Hon. Mr. SECRETARY OF STATE:

In the mission which I have held in the United States, I have been particularly charged to represent the noble aspirations of the government and people of Nicaragua that their isthmus should be adopted for the canal which ought to unite the two oceans.

My government, in previous times, has heard with regret that it was considered by the press of this country as rather unwilling to enter into the progressive movement of the age, perhaps because it defended its rights against the unfounded pretensions of canal or transit companies; and therefore, on perceiving that this Government took an interest in the realization of the work, mine not only received with approbation its exploring commissions, but established a legation with the primordial object of insuring that concern which on several occasions it has manifested in favor of the undertaking. The honor which has been conferred upon me by my being designated to transmit these sentiments is due solely to the known enthusiasm with which I have ever regarded the projected work.

Since I had the honor to be officially received, I have manifested, by speech and by writing, the earnest wish of my government, and I doubt not that his Excellency the President, his honorable Cabinet, and the whole nation, will have been impregnated with the desideratum of my country; not because I may have been able to express it, but because from the clear-sightedness of this Government and this people cannot be hidden the consequences which are logically inferable from the facts.

Thus it is, that, having discharged my principal duty, I might have retired, but I was desirous first of hearing the opinion of the high commission in regard to the practicability of the work, and, if it was favorable to Nicaragua, to carry to her this present which she awaits so anxiously.

With pleasure I have waited here for that opinion, announced for the beginning of October; but now I know with certainty that Professor Peirce, member of the commission, will not arrive at this capital before even November, supposing that there are no unforeseen delays, such as before have occurred to prevent the termination of this affair, which may thus be postponed until the winter.

The honorable Secretary of State is not unaware that, through considerations of health, I cannot remain here until then, and, it being already impossible for me to carry with me that opinion, I think that I ought to absent myself for the present, in order to make report to my government and ask of it new instructions; or, if it holds that my mission is terminated, that it may send in form the proper letter of recall.

But not satisfied with all I have said in private conferences to his Excellency the President, as well as to the honorable Secretary of State, I have the honor to reiterate to them now that whenever it shall wish that the isthmus of Nicaragua be designated as the preferable route, this Government ought to rely on it that mine will yield to the most liberal negotiations which the work demands and which may be in its power to concede.

I take the liberty of sending to the honorable Secretary of State the inclosed pamphlet relative to the projected interoceanic canal, entreating him to be pleased to have it sent to the office of the commission charged with the examination of the isthmuses of America.

Any communication which the honorable Secretary of State may wish to send me, he will please direct to the care of Mr. Alexander Cotheal, consul-general of Nicaragua, at New York, 62 West Thirty-sixth street.

I avail, &c.,

E. BENARD.

[Inclosure.]

A few considerations respecting the Nicaragua ship-canal.

The discovery of the New World, and the project of cutting a canal through it to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, are coetaneous. But the elaboration of those deeds which mark an epoch is slow. Great events often need centuries to be executed, and the previous discussions to which they from time to time give rise are only the forerunners of their future realization.

While the various countries of America were still colonies, the canal was not forgotten, it is true, although no adequate efforts were made to secure its construction. The commerce of those days did not demand such an auxiliary. When, however, the entire continent began to share that liberty which was first secured and proclaimed by the United States; when it found itself the arbiter of its own destinies, every section that possessed an isthmus became enthusiastic for the construction of the great work, thinking that the time for its accomplishment had arrived.

Such was the feeling in Central America, and especially in Nicaragua, when that country became a sovereign nation, for Nicaragua thinks that the canal will be the most speedy and efficacious means to promote her prosperity, and that its construction is only a question of time.

Entertaining this conviction, the Nicaraguan government has always received proposals for the construction of the work with enthusiasm. It may be confidently asserted that so great joy never prevailed in that republic as when the California gold mines were discovered, because it was thought that, by reason of the impetus which would thus be given to emigration and to the commerce of all nations, the longed-for moment was at hand.

Overhaste, resulting from the conviction above referred to, has at various times been a source of disappointment to the republic, negotiations having been entered into with parties who were powerless to fulfill their engagements. These disappointments, however, have not discouraged her; she has remained unshaken in her belief that the interest of the world at large will one day cause the powerful hand to be uplifted which is to open communication between the two oceans.

The United States, that enterprising nation which has the gift of accomplishing what it designs, and which has the genius and the power to thrust aside all obstacles that stand in the way of great things, have doubtless inspired the men who control their destinies, and who will, beyond a doubt, satisfy their noble aspirations.

This Government has sent various exploring expeditions to examine the routes by which the work was considered practicable. This shows the lively interest with which this matter is regarded at the present time, and furnishes evidence that it will hereafter receive the consideration that it deserves.

In view of the many facts now in possession of the public, which it is unnecessary to repeat here, the expeditions which have visited Nicaragua are satisfied that they have found the route marked out by nature.

If Nicaragua would be gratified to see the canal constructed through the territory of any nation on this continent, inasmuch as they are all her sisters, and the benefits accruing from such a work would be enjoyed more or less by all, her gratification would of course be greater should the territory selected be her own.

The engineers who have examined the Nicaraguan isthmus have seen that there are no serious obstacles in the way of the enterprise, and although their observations were confined to the line of the canal, they nevertheless gained a clear idea of the elements of wealth in which that favored region abounds; still, a short description will not be superfluous, for the benefit of those who have not visited the country and of those who may have become or who may desire to become directly interested in the matter.

I.—The healthfulness of the Nicaraguan coast, on either ocean, could not be greater than it is. It is exceptional, because the coasts of tropical countries on this continent are for the most part sickly. At San Juan del Norte, Cape Gracias, Corinto, and San Juan del Sur, families, both native and foreign, have been living for many years, and have never found it necessary to emigrate on account of diseases prevailing in those places. When the journey to California was made via Nicaragua, hundreds of thousands of persons crossed that isthmus, and, notwithstanding the delays rendered necessary by a defective transit, the health of travelers was never known to suffer from epidemics. This statement will be vouched for by the various exploring expeditions which this Government has recently sent to Nicaragua. The many persons composing the same have had a good opportunity to appreciate, during the performance of the long and painful tasks allotted to them, the incomparable salubrity of that delightful climate, which is cooled and purified by a constant breeze.

Along the river San Juan this salubrity is to be wondered at when we consider that its banks are covered with the most luxuriant vegetation. Hundreds of huleros, or rubber-hunters, penetrate those dense thickets, being engaged the whole year round in extracting that gum, the trade in which, such is its abundance, keeps many persons, both natives and foreigners, at San Juan del Norte, there being not a few who with this one article have amassed considerable fortunes. These intrepid developers of the country's wealth, whose life is passed in the midst of privations and hardships, enjoy the most perfect health.

It would be superfluous to speak of the interior of the country, where the climate is the most delightful that can be desired. Americans and Europeans who live there can best testify to the truth of this statement. However little knowledge one may have of that region, the excellence and variety of its climate will be readily perceived, the northeast wind blowing there during the entire year, and the country extending from the fertile plains of the Pacific to the elevated table-lands which overlook the Atlantic on the north.

II.—The Central American states, like almost the whole of America, are very mountainous, and the various mountain-chains and their branches intersect each other in every direction. Nicaragua alone is there an exception in this respect. Four of its departments, Rivas, Granada, Leon, and Chinandega, the principal ones as regards the development of their agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, are level, especially the one first named, which comprises the isthmus proper, and which has always been considered as the most suitable locality for the canal.

The Andes range of mountains, so lofty throughout its whole extent, is broken in Nicaragua, as if Nature had designed to remove this great obstacle, leaving the rest of the work only to be accomplished by the skill and labor of man.

III.—The materials which would be required for the construction of the work are found in inexhaustible quantities in the departments referred to. The white and brown lime found in the numerous pits which they contain, is of so excellent a quality that mortar made from it is not inferior to Roman cement. Commander Edward P. Lull, U. S. N., and Mr. Aniceto G. Menocal, civil engineer, both distinguished explorers of that isthmus, were surprised at the solidity of sundry very old edifices built with this material, and have brought specimens of it to this country for the purpose of submitting them to scientific examinations.

Immense quarries, containing stone in every variety, are found in the immediate vicinity of the proposed line of the canal. Moreover, that none of the requisites for mason-work may be wanting, clay of a superior quality, suitable for the manufacture of brick, abounds in the same locality.

The abundance of timber which would be available for the enterprise, from San Juan del Norte to Brito, or any other point on the Pacific which might be selected as one of the termini of the canal, is still more prodigious, and not only is timber found suitable for the construction of buildings, vessels, or other preparatory works which might be required, but also of a quality which is remarkable on account of its durability when placed under ground or under water.

The engineers of the expeditions which have explored the isthmus, were frequently struck with astonishment at the lavish bounty with which nature had provided, along the entire route examined by them, all the materials that would be required.

The prodigality of nature, however, did not end there. She also designed to facilitate the conveyance of these materials, and formed that wonderful chain of lakes, which extends from north to south throughout the center of almost the entire republic, thus creating a natural and permanent means of communication which leaves nothing to be desired. She also formed the plains which lie between the lakes and the Pacific, and which are now intersected by wagon-roads in every direction.

IV.—While Nicaragua has in abundance the materials required for the work, she also has a population which understands its meaning; which desires it, and which will give it a decisive impulse by furnishing its quota of mechanics, and of intelligent, docile laborers who are inured to every kind of toil. The wages of such persons, which are so high in other countries on account of the heavy cost of living, are in Nicaragua one dollar per diem for the class first mentioned, and fifty cents for the latter. The population of the republic being three hundred thousand, it could easily furnish from three to five thousand men for the work in question, without prejudice to its agriculture and other branches of industry. The Nicaraguan laborer, moreover, must be considered as the most perfect model of what is required for work of this kind; having a thorough knowledge of the country, through his fondness for traveling, not being affected by the heat of the tropics, accustomed to labor, unmindful of the inclemency of the weather, frugal in his mode of life, of a cheerful disposition, and faithful to his employer, he seems to possess every condition needed in order to render his assistance valuable in the highest degree.

Not only Nicaragua, however, will furnish men to aid in the accomplishment of the great project. Her sisters and neighbors, the republics of Central America, containing a population of two millions, will lend their powerful aid. It may be said that the laboring class of Guatemala, Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica is as well adapted to perform the labor which this work will require, and to support the hardships incident thereto, as is that of Nicaragua. Besides, the feeling which prevails among the people of those countries and the friendly disposition of their governments are a guarantee of their hearty co-operation. The inhabitants of all those countries justly consider the Nicaragua canal as a national work, and as the most effective step which can be taken, in the way of peaceful measures, toward the establishment of a Central American Union. The official communications which have recently been addressed to Nicaragua by those governments, and which will be found at the end of this pamphlet, furnish reliable evidence of these generous sentiments.

V.—Now that I have spoken, although very briefly, of the favorable conditions presented by that portion of the republic which extends along the Pacific, and of the peculiar facilities which it offers for agriculture, it will not be out of place to make some reference to the almost untouched wealth of the broad strip of land which borders on the Atlantic on the east.

The departments of Segovia, Matagalpa, Chontales, and the Mosquito territory, which are situated in that region, could not have been more munificently endowed by nature. Favored as they are by the variety of climate resulting from the elevation of their mountains and the depth of their valleys, watered by innumerable rivers and streams, motive power and wealth of soil present themselves there at every step to the industry of man. Medicinal and fragrant plants, such as sarsaparilla, ginger, and vanilla, are everywhere met with; vast forests are found, consisting of logwood, moranwood, mahogany, ebony, and various other kinds of wood used in dyeing and fine cabinet-work; gums and balsams, such as copaiba, caoutchouc, balsamum nigrum, and gutta-percha, abound. The richest deposits of gold, silver, quicksilver, copper, and other minerals are found at the very surface of the earth.

Who does not know that Chontales is called the gold region? And what shall we say of the animal kingdom? So many are the varieties of which it is composed that it would be necessary to write many pages in order merely to give an idea of them.

In those departments we find, succeeding each other in admirable harmony, extensive plains of natural pasture, where vast herds of neat-cattle and horses graze; fertile table-lands, at a considerable height above the level of the sea, where wheat grows by the side of the sugar-cane; and, on the lofty and cold mountain-tops, wild silk and vegetable wax are produced in the immediate vicinity of the majestic forests of pitch-pine.

Those regions only need adequate means of communication in order to offer their incalculable wealth in the utmost abundance to the throngs of emigrants who annually leave their native land, fleeing from the sterility of a soil which has been impoverished by long and uninterrupted cultivation.

Few localities are so well adapted, as those which I am now describing, to one of the imperative necessities of the canal. This is referred to by Hon. G. M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy, in his report for 1872, in the following remarkable words: "The route of the proposed canal, besides geographical position, should, if possible, be through a locality capable of developing local population, wealth, trade, and agriculture, for these in themselves would be a protectorate and guardian of the great work, and would provide sufficient supplies, repairs, and other necessities to passing navigation, which, in localities less favored or more remote, could only be secured at great expense and under certain conditions."

VI.—Nicaragua, as everybody knows, possesses among its various lakes two which are especially worthy of attention, viz, Lake Managua and Lake Nicaragua, whose waters could not be better than they are for all the ordinary uses of life. The former, which is smaller than the latter, flows into it through the Tipatapa River, and both, together with that natural canal, occupy an extent of nearly two hundred miles in length. Many never-failing rivers and streams, which water the vast sides of the great basin of those lakes, discharge their waters during the entire year, more or less abundantly, into those immense reservoirs.

The smaller lake, which is highly picturesque, and on the shore of which stands the capital of the republic, terminates at the north near the Pacific. A strip of land eighteen miles in width separates it from that ocean. This circumstance, together with that of its being connected with the great lake by the Tipitapa River, doubtless led the illustrious prisoner of Ham to suggest this line as the best for the proposed Nicaragua canal. Now that the question has been examined and discussed in all its bearings, science has demonstrated the superiority of that other portion of the isthmus, which was selected by Colonel Childs as being the best route, and which, in view of the additional light which has been thrown upon it by the recent expeditions of Commanders Hatfield and Lull, is the one which decidedly deserves the preference. The great lake and the Pacific are in such close proximity to each other, in this section, that the noise of the waves of both is often heard at the same time. The shortest distance between them is not greater than ten miles; and notwithstanding the curves of the line now proposed, which terminates at the port of Brito, the length of said line does not exceed sixteen miles.

If Lake Managua is, for many reasons, deserving of attention, Lake Nicaragua is infinitely more so. With a length of one hundred and ten and a breadth of thirty-five miles, it cannot properly be called a lake; it is really an inland sea. The great body of water which it pours into the Atlantic through the San Juan River, and which is estimated to be thirty times greater than the amount needed for the purposes of the canal; its small elevation above the average level of the two oceans, (106 feet;) the great relative depth of its waters; the constant breeze which cools it; the fertility, the abundant products, the population, and the continual traffic of its shores; its excellent ports; its numerous and rich islands, among which Ometepe is a real wonder, on account of the majesty of its cone and the spontaneous growth of its vegetation; all these inestimable conditions make that great lake the true harbor of the canal, where all the squadrons of the world will at all times be able to find shelter.

VII.—As a complement of the advantageous circumstances which militate in favor of the proposed canal, it is necessary to give an idea of the total extent of the territory of Nicaragua, of the population which it is able to maintain, and of the desire of its inhabitants to promote immigration.

The republic embraces a surface of 34,500 square miles of a soil whose fertility is such that it could easily support several millions of inhabitants. One-third of this surface is owned by individuals and by communities; the remaining two-thirds are the property of the nation, and are one of the sources of income of the public treasury.

Foreigners as well as natives can now purchase these lands at the insignificant rate of from twenty to forty cents per acre, according to their quality and the kind of wood which they contain; but they may even be obtained by the former without the payment of any money whatever. The people of Nicaragua, being well aware of the advantages consequent upon immigration, have taken various measures to promote it, among which may be mentioned the passage of the law of March 10, 1865, in relation to land-grants. Even if the republic had not, on sundry occasions, furnished incontestable evidence of its liberality, and of its earnest desire to place itself in contact with the most advanced civilization, this law alone would be sufficient to prove to the whole world that selfishness has no hold upon the Nicaraguan people. The law in question authorizes the government to grant to any family (of whatever nationality) coming to the republic with the intention of becoming naturalized, as many as one hundred and twenty *manzanas of public land, such families being, moreover, entitled to use the lands of communities on the same terms as natives of the country. The same law exempts the immigrant for ten years from municipal service, and from the performance of military duty. There is no tax on property in Nicaragua.

VIII.—I now pass on briefly to sketch the distinguishing characteristics of the proposed Nicaragua Canal in relation to its practicability as regards the work of the engineer, and the expectations of the capitalist, since the necessity of a ship-canal through one of the isthmuses of America is a question which no longer admits of debate.

IX.—It is very noteworthy that throughout the route proposed for the construction of the canal in Nicaragua, the maximum depth of the cut is so small that the terrible bug-bear of a tunnel is entirely eliminated.

The difficulties and dangers connected with such a work would be incalculable.

The exceptionally great width and height of such a subterranean passage, the quantity of timber that would be required even to begin the construction of so vast an arch, the enormous cost of the entire work, and, finally, the damage to which it would be liable from the formation of fissures and from the considerable filtration produced by the tropical rains, are obstacles of such magnitude that, were it necessary to overcome them, their influence in the scale of probabilities would be decidedly adverse.

X.—That inexhaustible body of water, the great lake to which I have alluded, is no less remarkable, situated as it is at the highest point of the route, and yet at such an elevation above the level of the oceans that the descent will be very gradual.

The supply of water, in all plans for an interoceanic canal to cross the American continent, has perhaps always been the most important problem, a satisfactory solution of which has never been found. The combinations which have been proposed, in order to supply this great want, have been very complicated, involving heavy outlays of money, exhausting the resources of the engineer, and utilizing every available drop of water to form a reservoir at best but scanty and badly situated.

In Nicaragua this work is done, and on a grand scale, as nature alone could have done it. Not even the slightest effort on the part of the engineer is required there, and there is sufficient water not only for one but for thirty canals.

Besides, the dimensions of that lake and the other advantages which it possesses make it, as I have already remarked, the true harbor of the canal. This circumstance lessens very considerably the importance of the harbors required by the work, and reduces them, so to speak, to mere points of entrance having the required width and depth. On the Atlantic side this fact is more conspicuous. At a distance of six miles from the coast, following the line of the proposed canal across an almost level section of country, is found Silico Lake, which is thoroughly sheltered from the winds, and the water of which is drinkable. It has a surface of two square miles, and a depth at present of sixteen feet, with a muddy bottom. Not a single lock would be needed between this lake and the ocean.

XI. The subject of locks, in the estimates for the great work, is also one which has perplexed the engineer on all the isthmuses which have been explored. In some localities an exorbitant number is proposed, thus impeding the general traffic; in others, the limited space in which they are to be constructed requires complicated, expensive, and probably dangerous combinations.

In Nicaragua the insignificant elevation of the great lake above the level of the oceans simplifies this problem amazingly. Scarcely ten locks, of a moderate height, would be required to effect the ascent or descent of one hundred and six feet, which is the difference between the highest and the lowest part of the canal. Another very favorable circumstance for these locks is that they can be located on a right line, in advantageous situations, and at great distances apart, the difficulties being thus avoided which would naturally arise from the close proximity of such works.

XII. The prevailing winds are also of capital importance as regards the canal. Science will one day, perhaps, invent some means of locomotion as rapid as steam and as cheap as sails, which will almost neutralize this importance. Meanwhile, we cannot overlook the advantages which that element offers to the immense traffic in productions of prime necessity.

Calms, which are often so detrimental to the progress of sailing-vessels, are unknown on the coast of Nicaragua—a very different state of things from that which is observed on some of the neighboring coasts. In the Pacific, from the Gulf of Fonseca to Salinas Bay, and in the Atlantic, from Cape Gracias to the mouth of the San Juan, the winds never cease to blow. A vessel could enter and leave the canal in those regions at any season of the year without being subjected to any delay on account of calms.

The sagacity of the speculator and the intelligent eye of the navigator cannot regard so notable an advantage with indifference.

XIII. The canal via Nicaragua has among its other advantages, some of which I have mentioned, the no less important one of short distances, which so sensibly affects the interests of North America especially.

* The manzana is a square containing 92 yards on each side.

It is well known that the commerce of South America is carried on mainly with Europe and the United States, and to the nations of that part of the globe it is almost a matter of indifference whether their vessels pass through the Isthmus of Darien, Nicaragua, or Tehuantepec. They can have no very marked preference for any one of these routes. This is not the case with the northern portion of the continent, on whose Pacific coast there is so ardent a desire for rapid communication with that of the Atlantic.

The Isthmus of Tehuantepec, so far as distance is concerned, possesses, perhaps, the most favorable conditions for those regions; but the plan of uniting the two oceans through this isthmus has been abandoned. Its impracticability is too notorious; and, it being laid aside, the Nicaragua canal will offer the most speedy communication to the entire population of North America.

Comparing this route with that via the Isthmus of Darien, we find that, for a vessel sailing from any point on the Pacific coast north of Nicaragua, and bound to any point on the Atlantic coast north of that republic, the voyage by the former route will be at least eight hundred miles shorter. The distance thus economized represents an average saving of four days, with a corresponding avoidance of risks and expense.

Although the liberal character of the people of the United States leaves no ground for the supposition that they take so deep an interest in the accomplishment of this enterprise from merely selfish motives, it is very natural that the interests of their commerce should exercise a controlling influence upon their choice, and that they should prefer the route best calculated to promote those interests.

Immigration and railroads are developing the production of this country so prodigiously, and its coastwise traffic is so considerable, that the necessity is felt of giving to this great movement a wider field, by laying open to it a broad navigable channel across the continent.

XIV. It remains for me to give some idea of the cost of the work, and of the relation which such cost would bear to the benefits to be derived from it. In so doing, I shall base my statements upon the estimates made by the most recent expeditions which have explored the Isthmus of Nicaragua, and upon some abridged statistics of the commerce of certain parts of the world.

The important labors of the expeditions referred to, which were organized by the Government of the United States, were performed with the most scrupulous care. The high character of the gentlemen who composed them is a guarantee of the reliability of their assertions.

The entire length of the proposed canal, from ocean to ocean, is one hundred and eighty-one miles. It is intended that it shall be one hundred and fifty feet wide, and twenty-six deep. Deducting from the above length fifty-seven miles of sailing through the lake, and sixty-three through the San Juan River, there remain but sixty-one miles of canal, properly so called. The average depth of the cut between the lake and the Pacific will be thirty feet; between the lake and the Atlantic it will be one foot and seven-tenths.

The construction of the work requiring neither a tunnel nor the formation of a deposit of water, the length of the purely artificial canal being so limited, and considering the small number of locks, the cost of improving ports, and of accessory labor of less importance that will be required, I think I hazard nothing in saying that the estimate of $65,000,000 made by these expeditions as the total cost, is a close approximation to the truth.

This outlay, which is by no means exorbitant for an enterprise of such transcendent importance, will be diminished to the amount of several millions by a more detailed location of the proposed line, by the value of the lands which Nicaragua has always been disposed to grant in favor of the canal, with the mines and other natural wealth which they contain, and by the sums with which she would now aid the immediate improvement of navigation in the San Juan River.

At such small cost, the undertaking must be a financial success.

Even supposing the amount required to be double the above estimate, the commerce of the world would insure a remunerative interest. The Suez Canal, the cost of which cannot be placed at less than $100,000,000, whose success was so long a matter of dispute and whose importance will undoubtedly always be inferior to that of the American canal, is now an enterprise whose future success is assured.

The distinguished Professor J. E. Nourse, of the United States Naval Observatory, in his pamphlet published in 1870, in relation to the Suez Canal, says, in comparing it with the American one:

"The probabilities are that a canal here would even far surpass in value that of Suez. It will be not for Southern Europe only, or for Asia, or coast-bound Africa only; but for the world's trade." He adds that if the isthmus of Suez is "the center of the old continent, the other is the center of the great ocean, the Atlantic-Pacific; of the water as well as of the land of our globe."

Speaking of the revenue of the Suez Canal, he says: "Within the past twenty years the steam marine of England has increased 417 per cent.; that of France 613 per cent.; and that of Austria 637 per cent.

"The commercial returns of exports and imports for the Chinese Empire for the year 1855 were 281,000,000 francs; for the year 1868 they were 1,120,000,000 francs.

"The number of vessels entered and cleared in 1865 was 1,527, tonnage 529,222; and in 1868 was 14,075, tonnage 6,318,503.

"The Suez Canal Company, taking as their base the annual tonnage of Liverpool at six millions, Marseilles at five, and the trade around the Dardanelles and Black Sea at six millions, expect six millions as the minimum through the canal, and a gross receipt of 60,000,000 francs."

Admitting these data, and in view of the success of the Suez Canal, the approximate cost of that of Nicaragua being known, together with the superiority of its importance to that of the former, and not forgetting that the increase of trade is always in a direct ratio to the greater or less facility of communication, we cannot believe that the accomplishment of the project of an American interoceanic canal is longer to be delayed.

REPUBLIC OF HONDURAS, MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Comayagua, April 16, 1874.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note, in which you were pleased to inform this government that the United States steamer Gettysburg anchored in the bay of San Juan del Norte on the 7th ultimo, having on board a new expedition commissioned to explore the isthmus of Nicaragua, and composed of distinguished American civil engineers, sent by the scientific commission at Washington for the express purpose of deciding upon the route to be selected for the great work of the interoceanic canal, stating that, according to all the information received by you, the decision of the expedition would be in favor of Nicaragua, and, in conclusion, urging the government of Honduras to instruct its representative at Washington to use his best efforts to bring about such a solution of this important question as should be favorable to the interests of Central America.

The Citizen President, to whom I have communicated the contents of your aforesaid note, has instructed me to assure the government of Nicaragua of the very deep interest which is felt by the government and people of Honduras in the accomplishment of that greatest and most important work of the age, which will at once change the face of Central America. Although Honduras has as yet no representative at Washington, it will make a point of accrediting an envoy extraordinary, if the government of Nicaragua shall think proper, to the end that the question of the canal may be settled in a manner calculated to promote the interests of Central America.

With the highest consideration, I have the honor to be your excellency's very obedient servant,

ADOLFO ZUNIGA.

His Excellency the Minister of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Nicaragua.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE REPUBLIC OF SALVADOR,

San Salvador, April 8, 1874.

SIR: I have received your excellency's esteemed note of the 23d ultimo, whereby you were pleased to inform my government that the United States steamer Gettysburg anchored in the bay of San Juan del Norte on the 7th ult., having on board a new expedition commissioned to explore the isthmus of Nicaragua, which, after ascertaining certain facts, is to join another expedition under the command of Captain Selfridge, the latter being under orders to re-examine the Atrato Napipi route, across the Isthmus of Darien.

His excellency the President, to whom I have communicated the contents of your excellency's note, has directed me to say to you, in reply, that he is much gratified at the arrival of these expeditions, and that he earnestly hopes that their reports may induce the commission at Washington to decide in favor of the route via Nicaragua.

As your excellency is well aware, such a decision would be highly favorable to the interests of Central America; instructions are therefore this day communicated to the minister of Salvador at Washington to act in this matter entirely in harmony with the representative of your government.

With the highest consideration, I have the honor to subscribe myself,

Your very obedient and faithful servant,

M. BRIOSO.

The Minister of Foreign Relations of Nicaragua.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF GUATEMALA,
Guatemala, April 16, 1874.

SIR: I have this day addressed the licentiate Don Vicente Dardon, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of this republic in North America, sending him a copy of the esteemed note of your department, dated the 23d ultimo, and instructing him to do all in his power in favor of the Nicaragua canal, in conjunction with the representative of your country.

In having the honor to state this to your excellency for the information of the Chief Magistrate of your republic, I am happy to subscribe myself,

Your obedient and faithful servant,

MARCO A. SOTO.

The Minister of Foreign Relations of Nicaragua.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 16, 1874.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 14th instant, and have been gratified by the elevated sentiment which it expresses in regard to the subject of a ship-canal, from ocean to ocean, through Nicaragua. It is a matter of regret that the decision of the subject of those officers of this Government, to which you refer, should not have been made known prior to your return to your country. The cause of that return is much to be lamented. The good wishes of this Government will accompany you.

Your wish in regard to the pamphlet which accompanied your note will be complied with.

Accept, sir, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
 SANTIAGO DE CHILI,
September 25, 1873. (Received November 4.)

SIR: I regret to inform you that, although the treaty of 1866, between Chili and Bolivia, was intended to settle the entire boundary dispute between those republics, it has not done so. You will, doubtless, remember, by the terms of the treaty referred to, the twenty-fourth parallel of fourth latitude was the dividing-line agreed upon, but that the minerals, guanós, &c., lying between the twenty-third and twenty-fifth degrees were to be the common property of the two countries, and the profits arising therefrom were to be equally shared by each.

Within the past few years, disputes have again arisen, Chili charging that Bolivia has usurped an unfair proportion of the gains; and the subject has formed the basis of considerable diplomatic discussion between the representatives of the two governments.

A short time since, at an informal interview between the minister of foreign relations of Chili and myself, that gentleman informed me that a proposition to arbitrate the matter in dispute, involving the award of a certain compensatory amount to Chili, should it be determined she was entitled to any, had been submitted to the Bolivian government; that it was probable the proposition would be agreed to, and I was asked by the minister if I would consent to have Chili name me as arbiter, should the proper time for so doing arrive.

I replied, that while it was a traditional policy with my Government to observe the strictest neutrality in the hostile operations of nations, yet that its character as a peacemaker was no less marked; that, while it would not engage in war, except in defense of its own rights and the indisputable general interests of humanity, there was scarcely any length, in honor, it would not go, to preserve the peace of the world and advance the prosperity and happiness of the nations; that, as the willing representative of my country in sentiments such as these, it would afford me much gratification, should the occasion present itself, to render whatever of service might lie in my power and ability to reflect this benign and settled policy of my Government. The minister thanked me cordially, and the interview ended.

The whole matter is, as yet, in limine, and of course its present publicity would be premature; but I think it proper to advise you thus early of my action in the premises, trusting it may meet your approval.

SIR: Under cover of this dispatch I transmit a copy of a note from the minister of foreign relations, and also a copy of my reply to the same. The note of the minister is important as containing declarations in reference to the passage of the Straits of Magellan, which it will be well to have upon record for possible use in the future.

The debate upon the boundary question between Chili and the Argentine Republic has been very protracted, and somewhat bitter in its nature. There seems now to be but one resource left the parties, which is to submit the whole matter to arbitration. Chili is quite ready for this measure, but the Argentine has not, as yet, consented to the proposition.

During a recent interview with the minister of foreign relations the subject was incidentally discussed; and, if an arbitration is agreed upon, it is more than probable Chili will name President Grant as the arbiter, which selection will, doubtless, be ratified by the other party.

I have, &c.,

C. A. LOGAN.

Señor Ibañez to Mr. Logan.

SANTIAGO, October 26, 1873.

SIR: By the publication of the diplomatic documents which are attached to the memorial presented by this department, in the present year, to the national congress, of which memorial I had the honor of transmitting a printed copy to the legation over which you preside, you will have informed yourself of the question of limits which my government is debating with the Argentine Republic, claiming a better-founded right to the Straits of Magellan and adjacent territory, as also the extensive region known as Patagonia.

You may also have observed that, as shown by the documents, Chili took possession of the straits and surrounding territory in the year 1843, having remained up to this time in their peaceable occupation, and has rendered practicable the navigation of that internal sea which for centuries has presented insuperable obstacles to the transit of vessels. These obstacles have now disappeared almost entirely, through the expenditure of money and many sacrifices by my government.

As the debate upon the question is nearly exhausted, rendering it apparent that it must be decided or brought to an end by the arbitration of a friendly power, in case it may be impossible to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement between the interested governments, it appears to the government of Chili that the opportune moment has arrived to declare to the nations of the world, with whom Chili is in amity, what are its intentions in relation to the navigation of the straits, both in the present and future, and to promulgate its right to the straits and the territory it claims.

By order, then, of his excellency the President of the republic, I am instructed to inform you, to the end that you will be pleased to transmit the same to the Government of the United States, that Chili has always, as now, maintained the desire that the navigation of the Straits of Magellan may always be free for the vessels of the world without pretending to subject them to any other tolls or contributions than those indispensable for the maintenance of light-houses and the securing of safety to navigators.

My government also wishes to maintain the neutrality of the straits in case of the remote and improbable event of an exterior war, in such manner that, not even in this contingency shall there be allowed to be imposed upon the navies of the world any other limitations to their transit than may be required in time of peace.

In order to give to this declaration all the force and consistency demanded by the interests of commerce, there will be procured such legislative enactment as the case may require.

My government flatters itself with the hope that these measures, so much in harmony with the liberal institutions of the republic, will be considered by the Government that your excellency represents with such dignity, as a new proof of the desire with which it is animated to strengthen the good relations binding us to it, and as a sufficient pledge of security that these relations shall never suffer any prejudicial change.

I embrace the opportunity to offer your excellency the expression of the sentiments of high consideration with which I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,

ADOLFO IBÁÑEZ.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note, bearing date October 26, 1873, relating to the matter of dispute between Chili and the Argentine Republic, and declaring the intentions of your government in reference to the passage of the Straits of Magellan by the vessels of the world in times of peace and war. In response to your expressed desire, I have transmitted a translated copy of your interesting note to my Government which I can assure your excellency will be received with much pleasure and satisfaction, as constituting additional evidence of the high liberality and enlightened policy of the government of Chili.

I sincerely trust the question at issue between the two governments may be satisfactorily settled, and that Chili may receive every rod of territory she is equitably entitled to. Her rapid progress in all of the requirements of an advanced humanity have won for her the respect and good feeling of the best governments of the world; and, upon behalf of my own, I tender its moral aid and sympathy in every worthy effort looking toward the general peace and harmony of the nations.

Permit me to embrace the opportunity to renew the assurances of high consideration, with which I have the honor to remain,

SIR: In my dispatch No. 16, I had the honor to inform you of the request made by the minister of foreign relations that the undersigned should act as arbitrator in the matter of the boundary dispute between Chili and Bolivia, and of my assent thereto, conditioned upon the approval of my Government. Since then a convention has been concluded between the representatives of the two governments, in which the name of your representative in Chili is agreed upon as the arbitrator; which convention, it is expected, will ere long be ratified by the parties in interest. A few days since, Mr. Ibañez, informing me of this fact, inquired if I had had any response to my request, to which I replied there had not elapsed a sufficient time; that I had little doubt it would be granted, as it was the policy of my Government to cultivate relations of amity and good will with all nations; and, cherishing such sentiments to a marked degree toward Chili and Bolivia, it would doubtless render them any assistance it might be able to settle their differences peacefully, and that, unless some obstacle existed of which I had no knowledge, they need have no uneasiness about it.

I await your official sanction, however, before formally accepting the trust.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
SANTIAGO DE CHILI,

December 27, 1873. (Received February 5, 1874.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 19, having reference to my own dispatch No. 16, in which the information of the request of the Chilean government that the undersigned should act as arbiter in its dispute with Bolivia is conveyed to you.

The impression made upon you that I had purposed accepting the trust without the consent of my Government surprised me, and I referred to my dispatch at once for the purpose of noting its exact language. A careful rereading of the dispatch, which I remember was hastily written, in order to be on time to catch a closing mail, has shown me its incompleteness, and the just cause for your misapprehension. I beg you to believe, however, that nothing was further from my intention than doing an act so unbecoming my official position.

The matter at that time had been only broached, and I advised you of it at once, in order to put you in the earliest possession of information as to the progress of affairs in this part of the world, as well as to allow ample time for the arrival of the sanction to your representative, permitting him to act as arbiter "should the proper time arrive;" which sanction I intended to ask in the concluding line of the dispatch. This is very obscurely done, as I now see; but as it is my custom in writing to rather prefer too great prolixity than encounter the risk of want of perspicuity, I trust you will overlook the error.

What my real intention was, and what the answer I gave the minister, may be seen clearly by the following language contained in my dispatch No. 33, dated December 13:

In my dispatch No. 16 I had the honor to inform you of the request made by the minister of foreign relations that the undersigned should act as arbiter in the matter of the boundary dispute between Chili and Bolivia, and of my assent thereto, conditioned upon the approval of my Government.

And again: "I await your official sanction, however, before formally accepting the trust."

I greatly regret that the mistake should have occurred, but I hope this explanation will rectify any false impression my dispatch may have produced.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 19, 1873. (Received September 19.)

SIR: Referring to your dispatch No. 105, of November 13, 1872, enclosing the translation of a note from Colonel Freyre, the minister of Peru, informing you of the proposed appointment of a diplomatic mission to China and Japan, to negotiate treaties of amity and commerce with their rulers, and directing me to afford the Peruvian envoy whatever aid I could in carrying out this object, I have now the honor to inform you that, since the receipt of this dispatch, I have received notice from Señor Garcia, charged with this mission to these countries, of his arrival in Japan and successful conduct of his negotiations with the court at Yedo, and his speedy departure from thence to Peking. (Inclosure No. 1.)

In compliance with his request, I made known his expected arrival to the Chinese government, of which fact the envoy was duly informed. (Inclosures 2 and 3.)

The following day the prince replied to my note in the most decided manner, declining to negotiate any treaty with Peru until she vindicated her reputation in the treatment of Chinese subjects taken there as laborers. (Inclosure No. 4.) In this dispatch he alludes to the documents sent to him by Mr Browne (see his dispatch No. 29, June 3, 1869) and by Mr. Williams, (see his dispatch, No. 78½, July 26, 1871,) and to information from other sources, to fortify his position in declining the proposal to negotiate.

A translation of the prince's dispatch has been sent to Señor Garcia, so that he may have proper information to direct his future movements in such a conjuncture.

There is little doubt that the treatment of Chinese laborers in Peru is such as to justify the rulers of this empire in preventing their subjects from entering into contracts for labor in that country.

I will keep you carefully informed of the further proceedings of the two parties in this interesting discussion.

LEGATION OF PERU IN CHINA AND JAPAN,
Yeddo, June 15, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to address your excellency the present communication in reference to the mission which my government has intrusted to me in the empire of China, and in anticipation of my approaching journey to that capital.

Your excellency will remember that in the year 1870 the Peruvian government, being desirous to enter into treaty relations with China and Japan, and not finding it convenient to immediately send out a legation, invoked the friendly relations of the United States, and begged the American Government to instruct their ministers at Peking and Yeddo to represent Peru until such a time as the republic could dispatch a mission. On the 10th of May of the same year General Hovey transmitted to the minister of foreign affairs, at Lima, the answer of the Secretary of State, acceding to our request, and advising him that your excellency and Mr. DeLong had been so instructed.

Two years afterward, in August, 1872, his excellency Señor Don Manuel Pardo, having inaugurated his liberal administration, one of his first cares was to attend to the very important interests of Peru in China, with which country he had constant intercourse for upwards of thirty years. President Pardo, in consequence, appointed the undersigned his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary in China, with the objects of concluding treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation, and regulating, on bases mutually convenient, protective of persons, and similar to those adopted by other nations, the emigration of Asiatics to Peru.

When this legation was to be appointed the Peruvian government advised the Government of the United States of it, and of the purposes of the mission, and also requesting that the American representatives in Peking and Yeddo might extend their good offices to it upon its arrival, in commencing it, and lending such other friendly assistance as the occasion might require. To this request the American Government also assented most gladly, and the honorable Mr. Fish advised Colonel Freyre that instructions had been given to that effect.

Your excellency may already have heard of my arrival in Japan, and of the very flattering reception with which the Peruvian mission was honored by His Majesty the Tenno. I am happy to be able to state to your excellency that the opportune and friendly action of his excellency C. E. DeLong, minister of the United States at this court, has contributed in a most efficient manner to bring about that result and to facilitate my work with this government.

In addressing your excellency this dispatch, I am convinced that the representative of the American Union at Peking is animated by the same friendly sentiments toward Peru which have on all occasions been shown to her by the great republic; and, although I cannot yet fix the day of my departure for China, as it is not remote from this date I beg to express the hope that your excellency will please announce my approaching arrival to the Chinese government, and will endeavor to incline that government favorably to my legation, conveying to their mind the very friendly spirit in which it comes, the importance of its objects, and bringing to their knowledge the fact that the government of Peru has just enacted a new code of regulations for the protection of Chinese emigrants, making it impossible that they should be subjected to any abuses, which my government has always condemned and endeavored to punish; and at the same time assuring them all the rights which the constitution and liberal laws of the country guarantee to all foreigners in their persons and property.

For these good offices allow me to give your excellency my government's and my own anticipated thanks, which it is my earnest hope to be able soon to express personally to your excellency.

Begging you to please send your answer to the American consulate at Shanghai, with instructions that it be kept for me there, I have the honor to assure your excellency of my highest regard and most distinguished consideration.

AURELIO GO Y GARCIA.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 5, 1873.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's communication of the 15th ultimo, informing me of your appointment as minister plenipotentiary from Peru to Japan and China, and stating that it is your intention to shortly visit Peking for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of amity and commerce with China.

Some months since the honorable Secretary of State of the United States notified me that the government of Peru was about sending a mission to China, and authorized me to use my good offices toward enabling it to accomplish the object for which it would be sent.

I have now the honor to inform you that, in compliance with your request, I have addressed a note to Prince Kung, notifying him that a Peruvian mission would shortly reach China, and stating in general terms the objects which your government desires to accomplish.

If you find that my good offices will be of service to you in any way, I beg that you will command me.

I have, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 5, 1873.

SIR: Some months since my Government informed me that the government of Peru was about to send a mission to Japan and China, with a view of concluding treaties of amity and commerce with those countries. I was at the same time instructed to render the Peruvian envoy such assistance as I could consistently with my other duties.

I have just received a letter from the Peruvian envoy, stating that he is about leaving Japan for China, and requesting me to inform your Imperial Highness of the fact. He further requests me to say that it is his wish to conclude a treaty between his country and this empire similar to those already existing between China and the chief western powers.

In communicating this to your Imperial Highness, I take the opportunity to express the hope that the mission will be received in the same spirit which animated Peru in sending it, and that nothing will occur to prevent the conclusion of a treaty which will be advantageous to both countries.

I have, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 17, 1873.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch to your excellency of the 5th instant, inclosing a copy of my letter to Prince Kung, which I trust you have already received, I have now the honor to send you a reply received from his Imperial Highness. In this dispatch you will see that the Chinese government declines to enter at present into any negotiations with you as the representative of Peru, and base their reluctance wholly on what they have heard as to the treatment experienced by their countrymen in Peru. Though the high officers in Peking have probably no knowledge by personal inquiry among Chinese who have returned home, of the truth or otherwise of the rumors which are current in the southern provinces in respect to the condition of those laborers who have been taken to Peru during the past twenty-five years, still the documents referred to in Prince Kung's dispatch, purporting to have been written from Lima, which were sent to him from this legation in 1869 and 1871, have furnished the statements, and done much to form the opinion upon which he now bases his reasons for declining to negotiate.

These representations have been strengthened by the fact that so few laborers have ever returned from Peru in comparison to the number who have gone there, and so little can be ascertained as to the actual condition of those still remaining.

Under these circumstances it would be an act of humanity befitting the dignity of a Christian nation to furnish the Chinese authorities with the most explicit and reliable information, so as to disabuse them of any erroneous impressions they may now have upon this matter. Their own opportunities for learning the truth are not many, and a full knowledge of the matter might initiate a free emigration to Peru, like that to Siam and the United States, or Australia, which would supply her with cultivators and artisans to a great extent.

The decided and rather curt tone of the prince's reply will perhaps excite surprise, and is most reasonably accounted for by the present discussion upon the coolie emigration to Cuba with the Spanish chargé d'affaires.

I have, &c.,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

[Inclosure in 4 in No. 276—Translation.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Low.

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 6th moon, 12th day, (July 6, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith replies:

I had the honor of receiving your excellency's communication of yesterday, in which you inform me that you had been honored with a dispatch from your Government, stating that a Peruvian envoy was already on his way to negotiate treaties of commerce with Japan and China, and directing you to assist him as far as lay in your power whenever he reached Peking, adding that you had just received a letter from the envoy himself intimating his speedy departure from Japan, and requesting you so to inform the Chinese government, &c.

I may here observe that, during the ten and more years which have passed since China has made treaties with other countries, that mutual good-will has been shown by all parties; and now that Peru proposes to enter into treaty relations also, and has applied for the good offices of your excellency to aid her, it is reasonable to admit her proposal without demur.

But the manner in which that country has acted toward China is so different from the conduct of other nations, that she cannot be regarded in the same light, and I am obliged to enter into some details to explain it to your excellency.

The only traffic which Peru has heretofore carried on is getting coolies and carrying them away, so that there are now several myriads of Chinese in that land. These people are treated with such injustice and cruelty, and suffer such extreme misery, that it cannot be adequately made known.

In June, 1869, Mr. Ross Browne, the United States minister, informed me that the Chinese laborers in Peru numbered more than thirty thousand, and that they had presented a remonstrance against the harsh treatment of their Peruvian masters to the resident American minister then at Lima, in which they complained of the unbearable nature of their wrongs, and he (Mr. Browne) expressed his willingness to aid in whatever way he could to relieve them.

Again, in July, 1871, Mr. Williams made a communication upon this subject, and proposed that stringent orders should be sent to the provincial authorities in Kwangtung to issue a proclamation restraining the people from accepting contracts for labor in Peru. This government has also heard from other sources of the harsh treatment of Chinese laborers by the Peruvians, who never stop their oppression till death ends it, and whose plan is just to sell human flesh for money. The evidence of their barbarous dealings with the coolies is plain and explicit, and this government has no desire to make a treaty with that country.

But seeing that your excellency has been asked to act in this matter between us, this government considers that it will not be meet to repel the Peruvians too harshly or finally, but they ought to be plainly informed that until they return all the coolies to their own country and agree not to hire any more, no treaty can be made with them. If they decline this, it will be impossible to enter into any arrangement with them.

I have ever found that your excellency clearly understands the relations of things, and I am therefore confident that in this decision I have not overpassed the rules of propriety, and you will also agree with me.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 26, 1873. (Received October 23.)

SIR: Referring to your dispatch No. 132, addressed to Mr. Low, and inclosing an address in English from the Chinese living at Quito, purporting to be written by one John Williams, to Mr. Wing, asking for the protection of the United States against those who ill-treat them, and giving directions to bring their complaint before the proper authorities, with a view to some remedial action, I now beg to reply that it would be very difficult to do so from these papers with any prospect of good to the Chinese in Ecuador. The original Chinese text should have been sent from Quito, as was done in the case of the petition from Peru, in 1869, and then its presentation to the high authorities here, with such explanations as were necessary to its full understanding, would have left them free to act. As it is, I have no evidence to bring that the Chinese there need relief, nor have the officials any clear notion of what they ought or are expected to do in the premises. While they have a general idea that their countrymen are much misused in all South American countries, and that it is incumbent on them to do something for their protection, they still feel their impotence to do aught effectual, and at present are content to do nothing; nor do I see what direct steps they could take with any prospect of relieving the wrongs complained of by their subjects living abroad in that part of the world.

However, the appeal of these poor Chinese for help can be made in a measure beneficial if their petition be sent here in its original form, or one be drawn up designed for presentation to their own rulers, which will state in detail the causes of complaint. I should look for some good then to result, and the authorities be led to see better their own responsibilities, which in all such cases they have always been very willing to shift on others.

With these explanations, I shall await your further directions in this affair.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 6, 1873. (Received January 23, 1874.)

SIR: Referring to Mr. Low's dispatches of June 24 and 26, 1872, (Nos. 166 and 167,) in relation to the subject of coolie emigration, and more particularly to his recent one of June 3, 1873, (No. 261,) about the discussion between the Spanish chargé d'affaires and the Chinese government, growing out of their prohibiting the emigration of Chinese laborers to Spanish colonies, I have now the honor to transmit for your information several papers explaining its course and results.

The controversy has been dragging along rather slowly since the date of Mr. Low's dispatch, but has now come to a pause by the suspension of diplomatic relations between M. Otin and the Yamun.

In Mr. Low's dispatch he states that "it was finally agreed that their differences should be submitted to the ministers of Russia, Germany, England, France, and the United States, jointly, and that the decision of a majority shall be final and conclusive." This conference was held at the Russian legation on the 1st of August, continuing four hours, and M. Otin was heard at length upon his complaint.

Previous to this date he had also fully made known his views in conversation and letters, and I inclose a copy of a letter addressed to this legation, from which you can learn the manner of his argument. (Inclosure 1.) The reference in the second paragraph to an order from a planter in Cuba, received by his agent in China, requiring him to procure three thousand laborers to work his plantation there, is the index to the spirit of the document. In it he refers to the "officious reports of some consuls in Amoy," making his own explanations, and entirely ignoring the treatment of tens of thousands of coolies taken from China to Cuba before 1869, and disputing the right of the Chinese government to complain of that ill-usage, and suspend the fulfillment of the treaty until it can be investigated.

The article on which the claim is founded reads as follows :

ARTICLE 10. The imperial authorities will permit those Chinese subjects who may desire to go abroad as laborers in Spanish possessions to enter into contracts with Spanish subjects, and to embark alone or with their families at the open ports of China. The local authorities acting with the representative of Her Catholic Majesty in each port shall make the necessary rules for the protection of the said laborers. It is forbidden to take deserters and people who have been taken against their will. In such cases the local authorities can claim from the consul the restitution of the individual.

In carrying out this article the native authorities require conformity to the code of emigration rules issued in 1866.

In view of the approaching conference and arbitration the Yamun addressed two circular notes to the foreign ministers, containing the two points on which they desired categorical replies, in order to know somewhat the ground they stood on. In my reply I urged the appointment of the proposed commission of inquiry into the past and present condition of the Chinese in Cuba, as the only satisfactory means of arriving at the facts. (Inclosures 2, 3, 4.)

The conference was held at a juncture which quite prevented me from attending it, without such risk to my health by exposure to the sun as I was unwilling to run. I had met all my colleagues, too, at the Russian minister's office two days before, and our views generally coincided; M. de Geofroy, the French minister, was also unable to be present himself. It was a step in advance on the part of the Chinese officials, and an homage to the power of public opinion. Prince Kung was not there. No protocol was drawn up at the meeting, but I have obtained from the German chargé d'affaires his summary of the points agreed upon, of which he has kindly furnished me a translation :

1st. The Chinese government to send one or more delegates to the island of Cuba, in order to investigate the condition of the Chinese subjects settled in that place.

2d. The Spanish government to be at liberty to take part in this investigation, by appointing agents of its own.

3d. With a view to an impartial inquiry and investigation of the real facts, the rep-representatives of Russia, Great Britain, France, and Germany, who have taken part in this conference, will lay before their respective governments the request of the Chinese government, that the representatives of the said four powers residing at Havana may be instructed to advise and assist the Chinese delegates if necessary. The Chinese government can apply to the representative of the United States with a similar request.

4th. Both parties to be at liberty to apply again to the representatives of the leading powers at Peking for further decision regarding this matter.

The Spanish chargé agreed to these stipulations, and it would have saved much useless discussion if all present had signed a paper containing their views of the agreement. However, the Chinese officials were committed to so far taking a direct interest in the well-being of their countrymen abroad as to appoint a commission; and in a few weeks the Emperor's rescript was received agreeing to the proposal, and the names of the persons composing the delegation were notified to all the legations. (Inclosures 5, 6, 7.)

The chief Chinese commissioner, Chān Lan-pin, is now in the United States, connected with the education of the students taken there by Yung Wing last year; I know nothing of his antecedents, but I infer that his being from Kwangtung Province, and knowing the dialect spoken by a large portion of the coolies, has had something to do with his selection. Mr. A. Macpherson is an Englishman, and Mr. Alfred Huber a Frenchman, both connected with the customs service, and conversant with the Mandarin dialect and the written Chinese language. They are accompanied by persons familiar with the dialects spoken at Canton, Swatow, and Amoy, whence all the coolies in Cuba were taken.

I sincerely hope that you will be able to assist this commission in carrying out its objects, either by furnishing its members with such information or suggestions as will help them, and documents bearing on the subject, congressional or otherwise; or by directing the American consul-general at Havana, and the consuls at other ports in Cuba, to assist them officially on the spot in pursuing their investigations. The idea here is, that while the Chinese commissioner acts wholly on his own instructions, and is not to be hampered or controlled by the Spanish authorities, their delegate and the five leading consuls at Havana are to act as assessors, to see that the inquiry is conducted impartially and with due regard to the rights of all parties, and the attainment of the truth. I have supplied Mr. Macpherson with the copy of the decree of O'Donnell in 1860, and the more recent law of Valmaseda, ordering the re-engagement of coolies, which formed the inclosure in your last dispatch, No. 149.

On the 9th of October, the day after Chān's promotion was notified he presented the draught of a protocol in five articles to the Yamun; and when it was declined as unnecessary and novel, he threw up his office as chargé d'affaires, transferring the interests of Spain to the German legation. The correspondence between the parties was transmitted to all the legations on the 24th, and I append a translation of the Prince's dispatch with its inclosure, (inclosure 8;) its moderate tone seems to show that he is sure of his position in the step he has taken of appointing the commission.

The five points stated in M. Otin's protocol were much beyond the sense taken at the conference, and the first one, if adopted, by making the whole board into a mixed commission, would have paralyzed the action of the Chinese commissioner. Yet M. Otin had the right to demand that the Chinese should definitely admit the privilege of the Spanish government to appoint an assessor, if not a colleague, with their deputy; and their unwillingness to enter into an arrangement on this point seems to me to have been partly owing to their fear of, at the same time, binding themselves to pay an indemnity.

In this position of affairs the draught of another protocol in two articles was presented to the Yamun, on behalf of M. Otin, by the British chargé and myself, in a personal interview, and every needed explanation of its bearing given to the Chinese officials. The two articles were as follows :

1st. The Chinese commissioner to be assisted by a Spanish delegate, and the consuls of France, Germany, Great Britain, Russia, and the United States acting as assessors. No evidence to be taken unless at least three of the assessors are present, who are to have the power of cross-examining the witnesses.

2d. If the Chinese case be not proven, the question of indemnity to be referred by the Yamun and the Spanish representative in China to the ministers of France, Germany, Great Britain, Russia, and the United States resident in Peking; and the amount to be paid, (if any,) and to whom, to be settled by them.

A few days after the interview I received a note from the officials respecting it, and politely declining to adopt our proposal in adjustment of the disagreement between them and the Spaniards. In this note, after repeating the same assurance which they had given to M. Otin, that they harbored no suspicion of his motives, they added that there was nothing said in respect to a Spanish delegate at the conference, and concluded as follows :

Being apprehensive that our Commissioner Chān would be unable to carry out his inquiry thoroughly, and would on his arrival in Cuba be unacquainted with its people and usages, we therefore asked the five ministers here to give such directions to their nations' consuls residing there in respect to assisting our commission on its arrival as would further the satisfactory end of their visit. The appointment of an associate by the Spanish government to conduct the inquiry with the Chinese commissioner was not agreed upon at the conference, and it would be difficult now to add more at present, as you desire. The whole arrangement is as it is given in our reply to M. Otin, and was talked about with Mr. Wade at a personal interview with him, and it seems to be unnecessary to discuss it further.

To this a reply was sent, in which I maintained the understanding received at the conference, and that Prince Kung had admitted by implication that the Spanish government could appoint an assessor; for in his dispatch of the 8th ultimo, (inclosure 7,) he had affirmed as one reason for promoting Chān, that he would then rank with the Spanish officers living in Cuba. "In all western lands," I said in conclusion, "it is the usage, when one state sends a special deputy to another, for that state to designate an officer to meet and assist him in harmoniously carrying out the object of his mission. In the present instance such a course is necessary, in order that Chān and his associates may not, on their arrival, entirely fail in the end for which they were sent to Cuba."

This was on the 30th instant; and at present all direct relations are suspended between the Spanish legation and the Chinese government. The two foreign associates have reached Peking to receive their instructions from the Yamun; and though there is no doubt about the real desire of the imperial advisers to make the inquiry to which their attention has been directed, and that it will be attempted, I should be greatly disappointed if the efficient and harmonious action of their commission and the five foreign consuls in Cuba should be neutralized by their quibbling over this point. They say that if the Cuban authorities prevent their commissioners from landing and carrying on the inquiry by direct inquiry among the coolies, that no better evidence of the truth of the charges of ill-treatment could be asked for, and the propriety of prohibiting further emigration to Spanish possessions is thereby fully justified. One would desire to obtain the fullest investigation of the actual condition of these laborers, and if it confirms the charges brought of inhuman treatment, so much the better if it is a step toward the abolition of the present system of contract-labor in this empire.

The severe measures adopted by the authorities at Canton to prevent coolies of all kinds going to Macao, in order to stop as much as possible the delivery of those who may have been engaged by contract to go abroad, and the summary execution of all crimps and kidnappers who have been caught, have, I hear, made the business so dangerous and losing that most of the barracoons are empty. But the want of energy and perseverance in native officials constantly incites to new attempts on the part of those unscrupulous agents who are ready to fill ships going to Lima or Havana with their countrymen, even at the risk of their own lives.

A traffic like that which has disgraced Macao during so many years cannot be stopped all at once in a country like this; but when it has been made a losing business as well as a dangerous and disreputable one, neither can it be immediately revived.

I have, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

Mr. Otin to Mr. Low.

SPANISH LEGATION, Peking, May 27, 1873.

SIR: The difficulties that have been raised to the Spanish legation by the imperial government in the emigration question having to be definitively settled by a collective arbitration of the foreign representatives accredited in Peking, I consider it my duty to submit to your consideration a short statement of the facts in order to enable you to form an impartial opinion upon the question which you are called to decide.

Towards the middle of the month of January last, I received a communication from the Spanish consul at Canton, in which he informed me that a Spanish emigration agent had asked, through the consulate, the authorization of the viceroy of the two Kwangs for the opening of an emigration office in Canton, in order to engage, according to the regulations of 1866, three thousand workmen which his employer required for the cultivation of his plantations; whereupon the viceroy had refused to grant the required authorization, founding his refusal on orders received from the Tsung-li Yamun by him.

As soon as these facts had arrived to my knowledge, I repaired to the Yamun, where the Ministers Mao-Chang Hri, Chunghow, and Chéng-Tin repeatedly assured me that no such order had ever been transmitted to the viceroy of the two Kwangs; but two days later, to my great astonishment, I received a communication in the shape of an official letter, in which the Yamun confirmed the prohibition to engage emigrants for the island of Cuba.

The foundations on which this decision was based were, the slanderous talk of a foreign newspaper that falsely interpreted a decision of the local government in Cuba, and represented the Chinese there as being submitted to a forced re-engagement, and the officious reports of some consuls residing in Amoy, most of them merchant consuls, who guaranteed the truth of the facts advanced in the said papers. These reports of (extra) non-official origin, and of which no one had even thought to prove the accuracy, justified, in the eyes of the imperial government, the adoption of an extreme measure, the abrogation of an international compact!

Out of the animated and often violent correspondence that took place on this subject between the Tsung-li Yamun and the Spanish legation, the only result on the part of the first was the following argument:

"The cruelty and tyranny of the Spanish government to the Chinese subjects having been duly proved by the reports of a newspaper and of the consuls at Amoy, we forbid the emigration to a country where our subjects have to suffer such ill treatment."

This solitary argument, adorned with all the charm of Chinese diction, and reproduced under a thousand different forms, has been the only defense opposed by the Yamun to the legitimacy of my right and to the arguments by which I enforced it.

Newspaper abuse is too common and vulgar to be taken serious notice of; as to the semi-official reports of the consuls, these functionaries being 6,000 leagues away from the scene of the events, they had no other means of knowing anything of them but from the adulterated relations in the said papers, and are, of course, not able to guarantee their veracity. Besides, according to international law the interference of foreign and non-authorized agents is inadmissible.

The facts of the case are as follows: The accumulation in Havana of Chinese who do not possess any known means of sustenance, constitutes a permanent danger for the Spanish province of Cuba, which, besides, is at present unfortunately agitated by a rebellion now coming to an end. In view of the circumstances, the local government, exercising an indisputable right, has decided to separate the vagabonds from the industrious mass, and to give the first the alternative either of leaving the country or of re-engaging themselves; the mechanics, merchants, and all honest men have not been molested. Where, then, is the tyranny; where the cruelties?

Another fact that has been put forward by the Tsung-li Yamun in the last conference is that the workmen engaged in Cuba according to the regulation of 1866 did not receive, after the expiration of the contract, the sum stipulated for their return home, and that these wretched people were without means of returning to their country. The Tsung-li Yamun went even so far as to assure me that the information received on this subject was not to be doubted. It is sufficient to state that the first emigrants were engaged in the Chinese ports under the new regulation only, in 1869, and that the term of the contract is five years. To understand that, it is impossible that a stipulation in the contract can have been broken, which stipulation could only have effect after the expiration of the engagement, and the workmen of 1869 have not yet terminated it.

Since the emigration is going on in the Chinese ports under the new regulation, no case of abuse or violence has been signaled, no complaint has been presented on the subject, with the exception of the one that the Spanish legation brought forward last year against the Chinese delegates in Canton, who, in the absence of the Spanish consul, and notwithstanding the remonstrances of an agent of the legation, had allowed the departure of a young man who had not the authorization required for minors, mentioned in article 11 of the regulation. Well! The Tsung-li Yamun has not only left this abuse on the part of the delegates unpunished, but, turning a good deed into a crime, declares that this case constitutes an abuse, and that abuse being found in the emigration, the emigration must be forbidden. Most logical reasoning! Spanish subjects must atone for the faults of Chinese mandarins!

But let us suppose for one moment that all this is exact; that the Chinese government had, instead of bad pretexts, only good reasons to enforce its measures. When a government which is bound to another by an international compact has any remonstrances to make, or wishes to begin negotiations, it must do it by means of diplomatic agents; and it has no right to arrest the effects of the treaty, for it is under the protection of the treaty, and trusting in the good faith of the power that signed it, that foreign merchants have risked their capital in a hazardous speculation. If one of the two parties could voluntarily break off its engagements, what need would there be of treaties?

In the present case, the Tsung-li Yamun has not only violated article 10 of the Spanish treaty, but also the clause concerning the most favored nation—refusing, as it does to Spain, a right that it accords to other foreign powers; and the result of this violent measure, which has been adopted secretly, is the ruin of the agents in Cuba, who, under the guarantee of the treaty, had begun preliminary operations of chartering vessels, distributing sums to Chinese recruiting-agents, &c.

It is true that the Tsung-li Yamun considers the regulation about emigration to be as important as international treaties, and demonstrates that the Spanish government having (according to the Yamun) infringed the regulation, the Yamun forgets, or rather wishes to forget, that above all laws is the faith sworn in international treaties; that local laws can be abrogated or modified; while a treaty is unchangeable and permanent in its legal duration; that it is a gordian knot that can be severed only by the joint will of the two sides, or by the bayonets of the strongest.

Still, as a proof of sincerity and of the little fear we have of the examination of the condition of Chinese in Cuba, I have offered to the imperial government, on my own responsibility, a right which the treaty gives it not, that of appointing a consul in Havana, who could watch over the interest of his nationals. The Tsung-li Yamun has obstinately refused this, saying that at present it has no idea of appointing consuls in foreign countries, but when it would take place, Cuba should not be excepted, and that then the emigration could again be re-instated. Need we have a more flagrant proof of bad faith? I offer them the means of investigating the facts and of protecting their nationals, and they reject them; but if they refuse to lead the life of civilized nations, Spain cannot change the code of international law in order to serve their whims by admitting the intrusion of foreign elements into her affairs. But it is not the welfare of its expatriated subjects that the imperial government is so anxious about; this is only a pretext, and at the bottom of the question there is something very important—it is the long-prepared plan of the imperial government to break off one by one all the links by which it is bound to the civilized world; and it begins with the nations of which it is the least afraid, because it has not yet been punished by them. To-day, it is the emigration question; to-morrow, it will be the missionaries; later, the opium.

If we resume these observations, we find that the Tsung-li Yamun, taxing itself on reports deprived of all foundation, and the origin of which is irregular, has violated the treaty existing between Spain and China; that, notwithstanding my frank and loyal explanations, it has insisted in its decision; and, further, that when, moved by a spirit of conciliation, I offered it the concession of a right which would bring truth to the light and prevent similar complications for the future, Tsung-li Yamun has rejected my offer, without even informing me of the reason of such a refusal.

This, sir, is the truthful statement of the facts. I have not time to develop it more fully; but I hope that it will prove sufficient to give you a fairly correct idea of the question that is to be submitted to your judgment, and which could, in my opinion, be set down in the following concrete formula:

Is the conduct of the imperial government in the present affair in compliance with the principles of international right?

I am, sir, &c.,

F. OTIN.

His Excellency F. F. Low,
Minister Plenipotentiary for the United States.

Foreign Office to Mr. Low.

[Circular-note.]

PEKING, July 6, 1873.

The Ministers of the Foreign Office to his Excellency Mr. Low:

On hearing, some time ago, of the cruelties inflicted on the Chinese emigrants at Havana, and in the island of Cuba, we addressed a letter to M. Pereyre, the Spanish minister, informing him that emigration to those places could no longer be permitted. This decision was concurred in by all the treaty-consuls, and by them made known to the public.

The subject has now been again mooted by M. Otin, the Spanish chargé d'affaires, and as a difference of opinion has arisen between him and the foreign office with regard thereto, it has been suggested that the question be referred to the arbitration of the foreign ministers.

On the 15th of June, M. Otin wrote to the Minister Wānsiang, stating that the two points on which it was desirable that each side should fully state their views to the arbitrators, were these:

- 1st. Has Spain the right, under treaty, to insist on a free emigration to Cuba?
- 2d. Has China the right, under treaty, to stop emigration to Cuba on the score of cruelties inflicted there on the emigrants?

To this Wānsiang replied:

"Emigration is no doubt permitted under Article X of the Spanish treaty; but in that very article there is a distinct proviso that emigration is to be conducted under rules adapted to the requirements of each particular port, which are to be drawn up with the view of affording the fullest protection to the Chinese emigrants. And if cruelty does exist, the proviso about fullest protection is certainly violated. The present intention of the foreign office, to prohibit emigration to places notorious for the cruelties inflicted on the coolies, is not to be taken to mean that emigration to countries where Chinese coolies are not thus cruelly used will no longer be permitted."

With reference to the foregoing, the foreign office would observe that the convention, in twenty-two articles, concluded with England and France in 1866, had for its object the protection under treaty of the Chinese emigrants. It was certainly never meant to authorize the continuance of emigration under conditions which were inflicting injuries on the emigrants.

As the reply sent by Minister Wānsiang to M. Otin sets forth clearly when emigration is to be allowed, and when it is to be stopped, it only remains for the foreign office to request the foreign ministers to inform them—

- 1st. Whether it is true or not that cruelties are inflicted on Chinese coolies in Cuba?
- 2d. Whether, supposing it be true that Chinese coolies are cruelly used in Cuba, the foreign office ought quietly to submit to their emigrating there?

To these two questions the foreign office will feel obliged if the foreign ministers, after an impartial deliberation, will return a plain answer. If they prefer to confer personally with it on the above points, they are requested to name a time and place of meeting.

Compliments, &c., with cards of the eight ministers.

[Circular note.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, PEKING, July 27, 1873.The Ministers of the Foreign Office to Mr. Williams:

Having formerly heard reports that the laborers engaged by Spaniards to go to Cuba and elsewhere had been cruelly treated there, we decided to lay the whole subject before the foreign ministers for their candid opinion; and to this end furnished them with the points discussed by M. Otin, the Spanish chargé d'affaires, and Minister Wānsiang, and the reply given by the latter, requesting from each of them an answer informing us whether the Chinese laborers in Cuba were or were not cruelly treated, so that thus ground could be obtained for settling the matter.

M. Otin having again personally urged the speedy settlement of these points, it is unnecessary here to repeat the contents of the letters which passed between him and Minister Wānsiang; and the special purpose of this note is, therefore, simply to request that you would inform us whether the Chinese laborers who have been taken to Cuba are, so far as you can ascertain, cruelly treated or not.

An early answer will be anxiously looked for.

Compliments, &c., with cards of seven ministers.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Peking, August 1, 1873.

On the 6th ultimo Mr. Low received the note of the foreign office relating to the cruel usage which the Chinese laborers in Cuba are reported to receive from the Spaniards, and inquiring whether, if such was the fact, the Chinese government should patiently permit their subjects still to be carried away there.

Since Mr. Low left Peking I have received a second note, dated the 27th ultimo, in which the foreign office again inquires as to the truth of the reports of the bad treatment of the Chinese laborers now in Cuba, and asks for an early reply to both their notes. I have also seen the note received from the foreign office two days since, in which the ministers propose to meet all the foreign ministers at the Russian legation, and ask General Vlangaly to confer with them, (if the hour of 2 o'clock this afternoon will be convenient,) there to have a personal consultation upon the two points brought forward in connection with Spanish contracts for laborers. Owing to the heat of the season, however, I regret that I shall not be able to be present at the interview.

With regard to the inquiry as to the bad treatment of the Chinese laborers now in Cuba, it seems to me that it is necessary for a man to be on the spot, and personally learn for himself the truth by seeing and hearing what is done. I am only able to say that since the year 1849, when the business began at Canton of contracting for coolies to go to Cuba, up to this day, I have continually heard of the unjust and cruel treatment which they have there received, and that very few of those who fulfilled their term of service had ever come back to their homes. But as I have never visited those places, I cannot myself vouch for the truth of these charges. If the Chinese government wish to learn their real condition, the best way will be to send a special commissioner to Cuba, who shall carefully examine and ascertain for himself the mode of treating the laborers, which it will not be hard to do.

As to the question whether, if the Chinese emigrants are harshly treated in Cuba, the Chinese government will be justified in forbidding further engagement of its subjects to go there as laborers, I consider that it has that right, and can forbid it.

With compliments, &c.,

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 8th moon, 3d day. (September 24, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication respecting the questions at issue with the Spanish government about Chinese coolies in Cuba.

The foreign office has now appointed Chān Lan-pin, a titular prefect, who had charge of the pupils sent abroad, (to the United States,) to be a special commissioner to go to Cuba to inquire into and manage the matter, and has associated with him A. Macpherson, now commissioner of customs at Hankow, and A. Huber, now commissioner of customs at Tien-Tsin, who are to join him and proceed to Havana at once.

These appointments were reported to the throne on the 21st, and His Majesty's rescript has been received approving of them.

In making these appointments known to your excellency, it seems to me also proper to say, that as these commissioners on reaching Havana will be unacquainted with the people and places, I hope that you will make known to the proper officers at Washington their purpose in going, to the end that directions may be given to the American consuls at that port, and elsewhere in Cuba, to afford them such assistance on their arrival as will further the attainment of the objects of their visit.

His Excellency S. WELLS WILLIAMS,
United States Chargé d'Affaires to China.

[Inclosure 6 in No. 9.]

Mr. Williams to Prince Kung.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 25, 1873.

SIR: I was honored by the receipt of your Imperial Highness's dispatch of yesterday, in which you inform me that three commissioners, Messrs. Chān Lan-pin, A. Macpherson, and A. Huber, have been appointed to go to Cuba, there to inquire into the treatment of Chinese laborers; and as they will on arrival be unacquainted with the people and places, the hope is expressed that I will move the United States Government to advise its consular officers in that island to afford them such assistance as will further their object.

During the twenty and more years since Chinese laborers began to be carried to Cuba from Kwangtung Province, the report of the hardships they have suffered there has never ceased, and no one knows their extent. It is, therefore, a source of great satisfaction to me to learn from this dispatch that a commission has been appointed to proceed there and inquire carefully into the truth of the reports. Such a course evinces a regard for the Chinese now there, and is an act suitable to the national character and will elevate the reputation of China.

I will not fail to inform the Government I have the honor to represent of these things, and to request that directions may be given to the American consuls in the island to give such assistance to the commission on its arrival as they may be able.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew the assurance of my respect.

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

His Imperial Highness PRINCE KUNG, &c.

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 8th moon, 17th day. (October 8, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

It appears that, in relation to the appointment of Chān Lan-pin, a law-adviser in the board of punishments, to go to Cuba as commissioner to inquire into the condition of Chinese laborers, his promotion to the full grade he now holds was not clearly made known in my previous dispatch. He is an officer advanced to the fourth grade, and is specially privileged to wear a peacock's plume.

By Chinese rule the law-advisers in each board rank with the intendants of circuit in the provinces; and as Chān has now been promoted to the fourth grade, his parity with an intendant and his imperial appointment as envoy to go to Spanish countries will make him of equal rank to the Spanish officers living in Cuba, and to the salaried consuls of the United States residing there.

It is proper that I inform you of this, so there may be entire accord with them in managing the affair.

His Excellency S. WELLS WILLIAMS,
United States Chargé d'Affaires to China.

[Inclosure 8 in No. 9—Translation.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 9th moon, 4th day. (October 24, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

On the 9th of this month, M. Otin, Spanish chargé d'affaires, wrote to the Yamun as follows :

"I inclose several articles of an agreement to be discussed between us, which, if accepted without alteration, can be signed and sealed by us, but if there be any parts to be amended please inform me," &c.

It was wholly on account of what we had heard respecting the condition of Chinese laborers in Cuba that we agreed to discuss the subject with the Spanish chargé d'affaires at a meeting of all the foreign ministers, at which they desired the Chinese government to send a commission of inquiry to Cuba. On the 2d ultimo a memorial was presented to appoint Chăn Lan-pin, a brevet law-examiner, to proceed there and make full examination into the condition of the Chinese laborers, to which His Majesty's gracious assent was given. His appointment was notified to M. Otin and all the other ministers; and it is certainly incumbent on this government to wait until its commission has been there and has made a report before taking any further action in relation to emigration; and there is no necessity at this stage of discussing the protocol submitted by the chargé d'affaires of Spain, which, moreover, does not agree in all respects with what was adopted at the conference of August 1st.

These statements were embodied in the reply sent on the 13th instant to M. Otin, who two days afterwards answered as follows :

"I have received your dispatch of the 13th, the contents of which are so much at variance with what was agreed upon at the Russian legation, that I can no longer transact public business with the Yamun. I have accordingly requested the dean of the diplomatic body in Peking to attend to it for me, and I beg you to henceforth regard me simply as a private individual."

On the same day a dispatch from Baron Holloben was received, stating "that M. Otin, the Spanish chargé d'affaires, has transferred his legation to me as dean of the diplomatic body, and all matters connected with Spain will be attended to by me until further notice."

In regard to this whole affair, I can confidently say that in all our intercourse with foreign ministers the Yamun has always tried to maintain a spirit of cordiality and candor; and even when we have been disappointed in not arranging everything, we have never cherished the least feeling of distrust respecting the motives of others. In the present instance, as M. Otin seems to us to be mistaken and have misapprehended several points, we have addressed him unofficially, recapitulating the circumstances, and carefully defining our position in the matter, so as to dissipate his distrust.

The general conference which was held upon this question with all the ministers renders it desirable to communicate these things to them, as they will hear rumors of them, and I therefore inclose copies of two dispatches from M. Otin, one from the German chargé d'affaires, and three papers in reply from the Yamun, and submit the whole correspondence for your examination.

His Excellency S. W. WILLIAMS,
United States Chargé d'Affaires.

[Inclosure 1 in 8 in No. 9—Translation.]

M. Otin to the Yamun, containing a draught of a protocol.

OCTOBER 9, 1873.

To His Imperial Highness Prince Kung, and the Members of the Foreign Office :

I have the honor to inclose the draught of a protocol in five articles for your consideration, which, if they are found to be such as you can agree to, we can then sign and seal. They contain nothing different from what was agreed to at the conference at the Russian legation on the 1st of August; and I respectfully request your highness and their excellencies to examine them with a view to their adoption. If there are some points which can advantageously be altered, please inform me. But before this affair can be properly settled, it is necessary that the unfounded rumors relating to the high authorities in Cuba should be fully discussed; and to this end I beg your highness and their excellencies to send me true copies of the dispatches of the United States consul at Amoy, and of the American minister, Mr. Low, containing these calumnious* charges, so that I can examine them.

* See note at end, page 215.

PROTOCOL.

The undersigned, prince and ministers of the Tsung-li-Yamun, and the chargé d'affaires for Spain, (M. Otin,) after having discussed the means of conciliating the difficulties between the governments of China and Spain, with regard to emigration to Cuba, have agreed to the following points:

1st. The Chinese government will appoint a delegate to proceed to the island of Cuba to investigate the veracity of the facts denounced connected with Chinese emigration. This Chinese delegate shall be assisted in his investigation by two Spanish delegates, one from the foreign office, and one from the colonial office of Madrid.

2d. The governments of China and of Spain will request the governments of England, Germany, France, Russia, and the United States, as mediating powers, to instruct their respective consuls or consuls-general at Havana to join the above-mentioned Chinese and Spanish delegates in their labors, forming altogether a mixed commission of investigation.

3d. This commission shall draw up a report on the facts alleged and on the general condition of the Chinese in Cuba, according to the prevalent opinion, by majority of votes.

4th. Pending the report of the commission, emigration by contract to Cuba shall be suspended; but it is clearly understood that if the said report shows that the facts imputed were incorrect, the Chinese government shall at once re-establish emigration by contract to the island of Cuba according to the regulations in force; and shall furthermore pay to the government of Spain an indemnity for the losses and damages that Cuban land-owners and their agents might have sustained since January last by the prohibition.

5th. The amount of such indemnity shall be fixed by common understanding, by the Tsung-li-Yamun and the Spanish legation in China; and failing to agree, the matter shall be submitted to the representatives in Peking of the five mediating powers.

Done at Peking, October, 1873.

Foreign Office to Mr. Otin.

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 8th moon, 22d day. (October 13, 1873.)

Prince Kung and the members of the foreign office herewith send a reply.

On the 9th instant we had the honor to receive your dispatch, in which you state: "I now inclose for your examination the articles of an agreement, and if there be nothing to alter in them, we can sign and seal them; if there be certain parts which you wish to modify or alter, you can inform me, and at the same time [please] send a copy of the communications from the United States consul, and Mr. Low, the American minister, with it, for my use," &c.

In regard to this, we may observe that, as you did not consider the declarations of the American minister and the United States consul in regard to the treatment of the coolies in Cuba and Havana to be supported by sufficient evidence, you then proposed that the question should be jointly discussed at a general meeting of all the foreign ministers. Thereupon they requested the Yamun to send a commissioner to Cuba, who could inquire into the facts; and you yourself urged that he should be appointed very soon, inasmuch as you were on the point of returning home.

We therefore, on the 21st ultimo, memorialized [the Throne] to this effect, that Càn Lau-Pin, a brevet law-examiner in the board of punishment, of the 4th rank, should be appointed to proceed thither and inquire into the condition of the Chinese laborers, and that Messrs. Macpherson and Huber, two commissioners of the customs-service, be associated with him in this service. We were honored by his majesty's rescript, "Let it be as requested;" which in due course was made known to your excellency and all the other foreign ministers. We also received their replies, as is on record.

Seeing that Chinese subjects are now employed abroad as laborers, it is proper that the Chinese government should send a commission to learn their condition; and in that case the members of the commission should take their own mode of learning the facts in the case, which they can then the better minutely report to the Yamun for its action. If this be not allowed, then the various statements on this point contained in the dispatches of Mr. Low and the United States consul must be regarded as reliable proof, and what need was there for the Chinese government in that case to send a special agent?

In what manner the question of the laborers in Cuba is to be acted upon must, of course, now remain in abeyance until this commission has returned and made its full report to the Yamun.

It is therefore unnecessary to take any deliberate steps with regard to the acceptance of the articles now offered by you; and, moreover, they do not altogether agree with what was decided upon at the conference held at the Russian legation on the 1st of August last.

The subjects discussed in the dispatches from the American minister and consul relate to the most important points touching the lives of our people; and they were all laid before you and the other ministers at the Russian legation last summer in the original documents. The dispatch from the consul was also inclosed in a dispatch to Mr. Peyrera last year, so that it appears unnecessary now to make another copy of them for you.

This is the purpose for which this reply is now sent.
His Excellency F. OTIN,
Spanish Chargé d'Affaires to China.

Mr. Otin to the Yamun.

PEKING, October 14, 1873.

To His Highness Prince Kung and the Ministers of the Yamun:

I have had the honor to receive the dispatch of yesterday's date from your highness, &c., and have carefully examined it.

In it you say that the articles which I submitted to you are totally unlike * the points which were generally agreed upon at the Russian legation on the 1st August. I can, therefore, henceforth have no further transactions of a public nature with the Yamun; and have accordingly requested the dean of the diplomatic body to attend to all Spanish affairs on my behalf. I shall remain in Peking only on my private affairs until I start on my journey, and have to request that I may henceforth be regarded by the Yamun as only a private individual, in which position, if I have any business, I shall ask the good offices of the dean of the diplomatic body to attend to it.

I have, &c.

F. OTIN.

Foreign Office to Mr. Otin.

[Caveat of the Yamun.]

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 8th moon, 27th day. (October 18, 1873.)

The Yamun begs to reply to his excellency M. Otin, Spanish chargé d'affaires.

On the 15th instant we received your excellency's dispatch, in which you informed us that, as ours of the 13th instant was at open variance with the agreement arrived at in the Russian legation, you could no longer transact business with us, and had accordingly handed over the business of the Spanish legation to the dean of the diplomatic body at Peking, and requested us henceforth to consider you as a private individual.

On the same day we also received the dispatch of M. Holleben, the German chargé d'affaires, stating that M. Otin had transferred the affairs of the Spanish legation to him as dean of the diplomatic body, and requested us, therefore, until further notice, to address him on any point connected with Spanish affairs.

In relation to this we beg to observe that, in all our consultations and transactions with the foreign representatives, we have always endeavored to maintain friendly relations; and in cases of difference of opinion and unexpected misunderstanding, we have, in order the better to speedily adjust the difference, always tried to preserve equanimity and calmness of mind. We have not, in consequence of disagreement on a single point, harbored general distrust on all points.

In relation to this coolie question, after obtaining the imperial sanction to the appointment of Chān Lan-pin to go as our commissioner to inquire into the facts, (an appointment made after consulting with you,) we informed you of our action, and requested you to advise your government and invite its co-operation. And when, on the 9th of this month, you personally handed us a dispatch, we replied to it in the same form, with all convenient speed, according to the real facts.

In all this intercourse we have always treated you as becomes a minister plenipotentiary, and have never failed in due respect toward you; so that it certainly must be some misunderstanding which leads you, in your last dispatch, to request us to consider you as merely a private individual.

If, however, you wish to hand over the affairs of the Spanish legation to another minister, because you intend shortly to return home on account of important business, this is a common occurrence in all legations; but the purport and expressions of your last communication are not altogether in accordance with friendly relations.

We ought properly to reply to it in an official dispatch, but having now had it and the dispatch of the German chargé d'affaires, we have preferred to address you in a private note first, stating our views, and shall be gratified to receive your reply, wishing you at the same time every happiness.

Foreign Office to Mr. Otin.

[Official caveat of Chinese.]

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 9th moon, 2d day, (October 22, 1873.)

Prince Kung and the members of the Yamun herewith send a reply.

On the 15th instant, we had the honor to receive a note from your excellency, stating that, as our dispatch of the 13th instant was openly at variance with the agreement arrived at in the Russian legation, you could no longer enter into official transactions with us, and that you had, therefore, requested the dean of the diplomatic body to take charge of Spanish affairs.

On the same day we also received a dispatch from M. de Holleben, German chargé d'affaires, requesting us to address him, until further notice, on any questions regarding Spanish affairs.

As we were, however, inclined to suppose that some misunderstanding on your excellency's part must be at the bottom of all this, we in the first place addressed to you our letter of the 19th instant. But as we received the next day another letter from the German chargé d'affaires, in which he told us that you had put our dispatch to you into his hands; that he and you had jointly opened and read it, and had then requested him to inform us that the reason why you had handed over the affairs of the Spanish legation to the dean of the diplomatic body was neither because you were in a great hurry to go back to Spain, nor because you cherished a distrust of us, but simply because you had deemed it to be useless to continue official transactions with us after we, in our dispatch of the 13th instant, had flatly declined the propositions which you had submitted to us.

We now beg to say, with regard to your excellency's dispatch of the 15th instant, that, though you may choose to make use of such phraseology, we may, on our part, assert that, in all our relations with any foreign power, we have never entertained sentiments of this kind.

Since you began to discharge the duties of acting minister for Spain, we have always treated you with all the respect due to a minister plenipotentiary; and as now M. de Holleben tells us in his note that you do not cherish a distrust of us, this would seem to prove that you are yourself also aware that we have really always treated you with the respect due to a minister plenipotentiary, and that we have never been guilty of any discourtesy toward you.

Referring to our dispatch of the 13th of October, we beg to observe that, just because Spain and China have been on friendly terms for so many years, we thought it to be our duty in this, as in all other matters, to state our candid opinions fully, according to the actual circumstances, and beg you, therefore, to take this into mature consideration.

His Excellency F. OTIN,
Spanish Chargé d'Affaires.

GERMAN LEGATION,
Peking, October 24, 1873.To His Imperial Highness Prince Kung, and their excellencies the ministers :

Your imperial highness and their excellencies' letter to me of the 22d instant, with its inclosures, has been duly received. At the same time I received also the original dispatch addressed to the chargé d'affaires for Spain.

After having consulted with M. Otin, I have now the honor to reply to it, and to inform you that M. Otin has with pleasure taken due note of the friendly sentiments toward the Spanish government expressed in your highness and their excellencies' dispatch; but as that does not at all enter into the essential points of the pending differences, and as M. Otin must suppose, therefore, that you still adhere to the position taken up in the dispatch of the 13th instant, M. Otin regrets to say that he does not see how he could, in reply to it, allege anything that might serve to alter the pending relations.

I have, &c., &c.,

HOLLEBEN.

Note upon Mr. Otin's dispatch.—This portion of this dispatch I have translated from the Chinese text, in which this word answers to that version. Mr. Otin having showed me the original texts in Spanish, for which he alone is responsible, I can say that the Chinese version is too strong for the Spanish word delacion or accusation, and that he applied it only to the document from Amoy.

The inclosures in this correspondence are taken from their original texts, in English, with the exception of the dispatch accompanying the protocol in inclosure 1. The translations from the Chinese are direct.—S. W. W.

No. 135.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Fish.

No. 10.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 18, 1873. (Received January 27, 1874.)

SIR: I have the honor to send you a copy of a dispatch from Mr. Knight, United States consul at New Chwang, relating to the inundation in that region, and the consequent disturbed state of the country arising from the distress caused by it and loss of the crops. Mr. Knight addressed the local civil and military authorities in August, setting forth the dangers likely to fall upon all classes, if the brigandage was not stopped; and when his dispatch reached Peking I applied to the government, as did the other foreign ministers, asking what measures would be taken, and urging energetic action before the distress and rapine became desperate, if not remediless. The miseries of anarchy have already been felt in that part of Manchuria, and the subsequent prosperity now made all classes alike desirous to restore quiet, lest they should experience a repetition of their evils; and it is to this that I partly ascribe the measure of success in the efforts of government, as given in Prince Kung's reply, (see inclosure 2,) to restore quiet. There is, I hear otherwise, a large measure of truth in its statements, but the distress and want must still be very great. The rains of which Mr. Knight speaks, and to which I referred in my dispatch of August 25, have been unusually wide and heavy, extending over an area measuring nearly one hundred thousand square miles, comprising the largest part of this province and the western district of Manchuria. All the bottom-lands in this wide area have been more or less overflowed. The River Liao, which runs by New Chwang, is nearly five hundred miles long, and its upper headwaters drain the southeastern slopes of the Great Plateau, west of the basin of the Sougari as far as the border of Chili province, into the Gulf Liaotung. Between it and the Pei-ho are a few smaller streams; but the latter, with its four tributaries, all larger than itself, pours the drainings of the whole southern part of the province into the Gulf of Chili at Taker. The headwaters of these affluents are about six degrees of latitude apart, and all rise in the range of hills which separate this province from Shansi, and converge towards Tien-tsin like the ribs of a fan; the largest, called Sang-kan or Hurm, and also Yang-ting, near its junction with the Pei-ho, rushes down from the uplands like a mill-race, laden with sediment, which is soon deposited along the flat lands, or raises the bed of the stream. The others join it near Tien-tsin from the west and southwest, and their swollen currents have everywhere burst the banks and spread their waters over the country. The single outlet is insufficient to relieve the excess, but there is no other opening into the sea, and the flood remains until it soaks away or dries up.

As the rain ceases and the rivers contract, only the water near their channels flows out, that which is farther off being shut in by the dikes and banks around the fields it has covered; the narrow roads are also unserviceable, as they are usually from three to eight feet below the general level, and at such times become mere ditches. These disadvantages of this flat plain have been really much increased by the efforts of the people to confine the rivers in their beds by diking up the banks, for the soil brought down has silted up the beds, and the superabundant waters cannot regain the channel. The mountains where the rivers rise are bare of trees, and nothing, of course, there detains the falling showers, so that there seems to be no remedy for the evils and disasters which come in the train of these heavy rains to those who live in the lowlands. One compensation is found, indeed, to the latter in the large crops which their fields produce when the water has dried off. At this time, ten weeks since the rain ceased, it is estimated that more than half of the submerged region has become dry; but I can obtain no reasonable estimate of the area still under water. Happily the spring crop of wheat was large, and the supply of rice from the south is now brought in steamers, and is more and better than when the grain-junks brought it, so that the distress is not likely to imperil life so much as in 1871.

For three successive years have the districts around Tien-tsin been flooded. The authorities and people exerted themselves manfully to preserve the dikes near the city, but their efforts were fruitless just at the highest point of the freshet, and, most sad to add, only a fortnight before the time of the harvest when the crevasse occurred and the waters spread over the fields, destroying the millet, pulse, and sorghum, and sweeping away the mud-houses. The loss of life was not great. This region is still covered and the people are searching its lagoons and deep places for fish, which find abundance of food there. It will not be dry until the warm spring comes.

I have deemed that you would be interested in these details of the calamitous flood in this province, as explanatory of Mr. Knight's dispatch. It is a great wonder to me that the people are so quiet amid their misery, but they know that their officers sympathize with them somewhat, and large supplies of grain have been distributed near the city, though necessarily quite inadequate to relieve all. The miserable poverty of the great bulk of the population, their ignorance and inertness, with the selfishness which dwells in all classes, and makes it hard to obtain relief, all combine to increase the misery, disease, and sufferings which follow in the train of so widespread a flood in this plain. Nor do I see how the surplus waters can be discharged without a new outlet is dug into the gulf; and this, I fear, would be choked with silt before it had been long in use, even if the resources of the government were sufficient to make it.

I have, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Newchwang, August 30, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to address you on a troublesome subject, and one which, with the exception of the local excitements created by the Tien-tsin massacre, I have been happily free from since the year 1866, namely, the disturbed condition of this province, and the almost utter paralyzation of the traffic to and from this port with the interior, arising from the presence of numerous bands of brigands which occupy the country between this port-town and Moukden.

The district represented by this consulate has ever been infested with lawless roving bands of more or less importance, but the prompt and skillful management of his excellency Wen-siang with a large foreign-drilled or armed force north of Moukden, during the winter of 1865-'66, and the spring following, and the just and retributive action of his excellency Ching-lin and associates, who then held office at this port, during the summer of 1866, appeared to have scattered them to follow their habits in other parts, or to lead a more honest life. Small companies, it is true, have appeared from time to time at different points during the cold seasons; one band approached so near this place last winter that some of the residents were obliged to give up an arranged excursion to a neighboring spot, but both merchandise and travelers usually escaped plunder by the employment of an armed escort guard, the members of which were under some arrangement with the robbers. But I may add that no one, to my knowledge, has ever disputed the repeated assertion that these self-same escort guards themselves often resort to robbing when out of escort employment.

However the case may be, the occurrences of the past two months have served to place matters, as regards the safety of life and jeopardy of trade in this province, in a position quite as disastrous and fraught with anxiety as subsequent events proved had been justly apprehended during this month eight years ago. The main and immediate cause of such a state of things may be attributed to the excessive rains with which this quarter has been visited of late. The native whose memory extends back half a century testifies that no such rain-storms within his experience have fallen upon this land. For two months, with but short and infrequent intervals, the country has been drenched with showers only equaled in the tropics, until not only is the country extending from this port-town southward to the hills under water, but the entire district between this and Moukden, and especially along the basin of the Sian, and the most important high-roads are so flooded that large boats may depart from the river-channels, and, in many directions, reach their destination by a straight course. Thus an extent of country not overestimated at 1,000 square miles is inundated, in which I need scarcely mention the crops are entirely ruined. In fact the staple harvests of beans and millet are decayed, and the stalks of the latter having floated down the swollen river may be met with far out in the gulf. These are just the circumstances most certain to tempt those in this country who are at all naturally inclined to predatory habits, and the comparative success of the earlier formed bands attract to their ranks large numbers of those who, through loss of crops, and homes perhaps, soon become demoralized and reckless.

Consequently, the condition of this province compared with former years is, beyond dispute, as I now state. The possibility of transporting merchandise from this port to the north, or of bringing produce hither from Moukden, without an almost certainty of seizure, is about as complete as if war was being carried on between the two points. Trade in imports is thus absolutely checked. In former years the robbers contented themselves with exacting only sycee or opium; now they demand any and everything on which they can raise the smallest amount of cash. Formerly they roved about on horseback, and there was some chance of the trains of carts escaping them; now they occupy the country along the banks of the Lian, which, under the circumstances, is the only course of travel, and a free passage without an encounter is not expected. Until lately the common escort-guard could come to some arrangement with the brigands by which the trains under their convoy were exempt from plunder; but now the brigands are strangers, and too eager for any division of spoils. A few years ago the provincial troops, the escort-guard, and the robbers were armed alike with the matchlocks of the country; now, there can be little question but that the latter have many in their ranks who are well provided with foreign rifles. All trade for the moment is so obstructed that, but for the large stores of produce at this port-town, not a single commercial transaction would take place. And, finally, the imperial maritime revenue has fallen off, and must show a large reduction for this year. Now, the fact is not to be overlooked, that loss of trade alone is a most serious matter to all concerned here, and with such a lawless and ruinous condition as I have related, both foreigners and natives alike believe they are justified in feeling apprehensive that life and property, unless some prompt and extraordinary measures are adopted by the government, will be imperiled the coming winter.

The statement above of my belief that the robbers are now provided with foreign arms may require some explanation. I can sustain it, however, by the knowledge I have long possessed and often reported, that the southern native compradors of this place are in the habit of secretly inquiring of masters of vessels if they would part with their stands of guns or pistols. Although, with every desire, I have been unable to detect with accompanying proofs a single transaction, no one hereabouts doubts for a moment but that large numbers of foreign weapons have been so obtained, and sent to the interior for sale. And my opinion on the subject is now confirmed since Mr. Taintor, the commissioner of customs, was, on the 21st instant, while sailing along the Lian on a surveying trip toward Sin-mun-tim, suddenly attacked by a number of men at a point about twenty miles beyond San-cha-ho, some of whom fired at him with foreign guns.

This band being strongly positioned for attack or retreat on a long island, and having four boats at their command, made several running attempts to capture Mr. Taintor, and his escape was a narrow one. He was forced to fire several return shots in self-defense, some of which one may be permitted to hope taught them a lasting lesson.

This dispatch has already transgressed the limit I looked forward to at the commencement, but I am most anxious to provide all that is necessary and true, in order that you may with ease convince the imperial government officials that it is imperative they should take immediate steps to avert in this quarter what may be worse than already prevails.

It is barely possible, so much do provincial officials dislike of all things to report unfavorably to Peking, that the Tsun-li Yamen may reply that they are not in receipt of corroborative information from their own officials. But I think not, for I know that the Tao-tai of this port and the Tartar general of Moukden are in active correspondence, apparently as to which shall forward troops here or there. And this morning I learn that the large Samshoo-Hongo, of the city of Newchwang, have returned their licenses to the officials with a joint letter saying that they pay their annual tax to Peking, but, since from want of protection they cannot manufacture and export their Samshoo with safety, they can do no business, and their license is without value. Interest is awakened in every quarter as to what steps shall be taken for our security during the ensuing winter, and I should fail in my duty did I not bring forward to your notice the several suggestions. The English residents have petitioned their minister for either a gunboat or a company of marines, to be stationed here until the next spring; while the commissioner of customs intends to inquire of the inspector-general, Mr. Hart, as to the practicability of one of the smaller Chinese gunboats being retained here.

Certainly both ideas are good, and such as are not lightly to be abandoned. For in the event of this port being attacked by a large force, as was indeed the case with the city of Newchwang, (situated but thirty miles distant,) in 1866, it is possible that the resident Tao-tai's 500 foreign-drilled troops might be required to await his orders for the defense of the native quarter, while the gunboats or marines would especially protect the foreign settlement.

My own suggestions, however, in addition to the above one, are:

First, that the imperial government be recommended to instruct the high officials of this province to provide, say, three or four thousand stand of rifles and ammunition, which shall be distributed to the proper officers of the several cities and towns, according to their size and importance, including the cities of Newchwang, Haiching, and Kai-chow, which are within the thirty miles radius of this port.

Second, that the Tao-tai of this port be instructed not to move the 500 foreign-drilled troops belonging to and stationed at this port, outside the limits, except for immediate purposes of defense. My proposition, it is true, calls for a certain expenditure on the part of these provincial authorities, but it will be a comparatively small expenditure if the expense is made to fall pro rata on each city or town thus supplied with such real means of defense; and in fact the outlay will not be greater than that the British government has more than once submitted to, with proverbial liberality and solicitude for its subjects and interests, during past winters at this port.

For my own part I willingly acknowledge that the active steps taken by the imperial government within my experience in 1866, make me feel assured that it has every desire and intention to maintain peace and security and uphold confidence in this part of the empire, but I fear its habitual delays.

I now leave it for you, sir, to deal with the subject, and the government's best plan is to forward its orders by speedy courier to the Tartar general at Moukden.

Confident that my reputation will acquit me of being charged as an alarmist, I will address you again should events warrant it.

I have, &c.,

FRANCIS P. KNIGHT,
Consul.

S. WELLS WILLIAMS,
Chargé d'Affaires for the United States, Peking.

[Inclosure 2, in No. 10.—Translation.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

YUNGCHI, 12th year, 9th moon, 19th day, (November 8, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a reply.

I received your excellency's dispatch relating to the local bands of marauders about Newchwang, which were robbing and levying black-mail at the stations they had lawlessly established; and, as I have already informed you, sent orders immediately, in response to your request, to the authorities to adopt measures for suppressing and punishing these men.

On the 2d instant I received a dispatch from the superintendent of the northern ports, covering a report from the intendant at Newchwang, stating as follows:

"Careful examination has been made for many days past, and no unauthorized stations can be found where black-mail has been extorted from wayfarers and traders. Formerly, as it was currently reported here that in Liao-yang, in those parts of the prefecture lying along the river Liao, were found many robbers, who waylaid travelers and stopped the grain on its way to market, letting them go when their demands were complied with, I immediately requested the military authorities to detail some troops to arrest them, and issued my orders to all the local magistrates of every grade at once to exert themselves to take and punish all offenders. I have now heard that the marauders have all dispersed, the roads and rivers are all open, and travelers or traders can everywhere pass as usual. As I report these things I may add that general orders have been given to the various magistrates and the foreign-drilled troops, to really exert themselves to maintain order and arrest evil-doers."

Having received the above, I can do no better than to send a copy of it for your information.

His Excellency S. WELLS WILLIAMS,
United States Chargé d'Affaires ad interim.

No. 11.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 20, 1873. (Received January 26, 1874.)

SIR: Referring to Mr. Low's dispatch No. 276, of 19th July, I have now the honor to send you the continuance of the correspondence with his excellency Señor Garcia, the Peruvian envoy, and an account of the progress of his negotiations, which I think you will read with interest. His first dispatch is in reply to Mr. Low's answer to him, and was written from Yeddo while engaged in negotiating a treaty with the Japanese. It deserves careful perusal. Among many just remarks respecting the isolation of the Chinese officials, and their unwise unwillingness to enter into any well-understood relations with Peru, it still gives a one-sided view of the condition of the coolies in that country, and studiously refrains from explaining their past treatment.

The argument he brings forward in the last part of his letter, that if the Chinese government can be induced to appoint consular agents in Peru the evils of the coolie system can be reduced, or removed, as they will watch over the interests of their countrymen, is very fallacious. The protests of these consuls would, setting aside all difficulties in the way of proving or even obtaining their statements of ill usage to the coolies, be perfectly powerless against the obligations of the contracts under which they came to Peru, and the right of their employers to see them enforced.

Captain Garcia's notion of the duty of Peru toward the defenseless laborers now in her own borders, and her privilege in China if the Emperor refuses to make a treaty about their emigration, exhibits the selfish, unscrupulous spirit of the whole system of contract-labor. "Peru must have Chinese laborers, and private parties will do what they can" to hire, cajole, or kidnap the Chinese as they have done, "and the Peruvian government will be powerless to prevent abuses in foreign countries." One cannot blame this government for regarding the practice with aversion, and in its present state of tutelage as to its foreign relations it can hardly be blamed for refusing to Peru a participation even in the rights of the present emigration rules.

The preliminary treaty between Peru and Japan is in ten articles, the seventh of which seems to look to the employment of Japanese laborers there. It reads thus :

No restrictions shall be placed by either government upon the employment of their respective citizens or subjects reciprocally, in any lawful capacity. They may go freely from the one country to the other, fulfilling the conditions required by the laws of their respective nations.

This last clause is too vague to base any reasoning upon it, but it is not easy to understand how the Peruvian government can admit the principle of ex-territoriality as apparently involved in this article, to such Japanese as may come to Peru. There is, however, no probability of the planters there obtaining Japanese laborers to any extent, nor would they be found to be as profitable or satisfactory as the Chinese.

The next part of this correspondence (inclosures 2, 3, 4,) contains my reply to Señor Garcia, inclosing Prince Kung's answer reiterating his decision not to make a treaty with Peru. At the personal interview I went over the whole ground ; the application of the Peruvian envoy for the appointment of a deputy to meet him and discuss the points which most needed to be understood ; the benefits of the imperial government to learn fully the condition of its subjects in that country ; and particularly, that it became the rulers of China to receive such an envoy with the courtesy their own envoys had experienced in foreign countries, and that this courtesy was not incompatible with an unwillingness to enter into treaty engagements permitting their subjects to be hired and go to Peru as laborers. They could not, or would not, see the distinction ; and as Señor Garcia had applied to them to negotiate a treaty, whose chief feature was to be the contract-labor system, so it involved the acceptance of that system if they agreed to consult with him about it.

The impression has become very strongly fixed in the minds of these officials, that the favored-nation clause forms part of every treaty, and every nation which has a treaty can and will demand everything granted to all other nations.

The prince, therefore, persistently held to his impossible stipulation, and said, "When the Peruvians bring back all the coolies we will make a treaty with them."

The leading points of the conversation are embodied in my letter to the prince of September 18, (inclosure 2,) and his reply of the 20th, (inclosure 3,) with mine to the Peruvian envoy of the 22d, (inclosure 4.) In this last I also allude to the influence which the discussion with the Spanish chargé d'affaires has probably had upon his decision. The two complaints from the Chinese now in Peru, made known to the Yámun by this legation in 1869 and 1871, have also produced an effect in leading them to the conclusion that it is better to make no more treaties admitting contract labor.

Previous to his arrival in China, Señor Garcia sent one of his suite from Japan to Peking to learn exactly the state of affairs. He reached Tien-tsin last month on his way hither; but the governor-general heard of his arrival, and when he essayed to go on as a private individual in company with a Frenchman, the boat was stopped at the floating bridge, and he was compelled to turn back.

The last part of this correspondence gives only the results of the visit of the Peruvian legation to Tien-tsin.

Señor Garcia's conclusion to come up the coast was (inclosures 5 and 6) approved by all whom he consulted; and I have no doubt that the governor-general had been instructed from Peking how to receive him.

* * * * *

I have not heard whether Señor Garcia has been able to act upon the suggestions in my reply to him, (inclosure 7,) or what other plan he has adopted. He has probably conferred with the commissioners to Cuba, who passed through Tien-tsin last week on their way to Shanghai; and decided his course of action before the river closes.

I have, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

Señor Garcia to Mr. Williams.

PERUVIAN LEGATION TO CHINA AND JAPAN,
Yedo, August 25, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt, in reply to my note to that legation, dated June 15, 1873, of the Hon. Mr. Low's two dispatches to me, dated respectively July 5, (in duplicate,) containing a copy of his note of the same date, addressed to His Imperial Highness Prince Kung in regard to my mission in China, and July 17, inclosing a translation of the prince's answer to Mr. Low, dated July 6, 1873.

I have since had the pleasure of a conference with Mr. Low, at Yokohama, in reference to his dispatches and their inclosures, and it is gratifying to me to address the present communication to you as the representative of the United States, a country which has always been friendly to mine. I feel more at liberty to do this, not only because you are authorized by your Government to aid this legation, and on account of Mr. Low's kind offer, contained at the end of his dispatch of July 5; but also because I am convinced that the merited influence which your long residence and distinguished services in China must have given you will certainly help me to accomplish the highly honorable and worthy objects of my mission, which are as beneficial to the Chinese Empire as they are to Peru.

Before anything else, I may be permitted to express my great surprise and disappointment at the immediate result of Mr. Low's friendly action. Although written only twenty-four hours after the American minister's letter, Prince Kung's reply is, as Mr. Low himself calls it, "decided" and "curt," declining to make a treaty with Peru.

This is the more to be wondered at, in presence of the fact of a Peruvian mission being at the gates of that empire, having traveled an enormous distance, and come to confer with the Chinese government, and arrive at an agreement precisely on the subject about which the present liberal administration of Peru had heard that China had motives of complaint.

It is, sir, allow me to say, very strange that, when the Peruvian government wishes to explain to the Chinese government what is the real condition of its hundred thousand subjects in Peru, to state to it that we have been actively working to give them the greatest protection and guarantees in the republic, for which purpose new laws and regulations have just been enacted, and now desire to contribute to make the illicit practices disappear, and to establish, in accord with the Chinese government, a system of lawful emigration of the best kind from the open ports of China, like that which goes to California or Australia; and, finally, when the Peruvian government, in order to make all this known, employs the best means, the sending of a special mission to the Court of China, it is strange, I beg to repeat, that the Chinese government, giving such momentous matter only twenty-four hours' thought, should answer, declining to enter into negotiations.

The principal and foremost aim of my government in accrediting me to that court is to enter into a treaty, convention, or agreement for the proper legal and moral regulation of Chinese emigration. I beg to be allowed to suggest that, probably on account of the prince's not knowing the real intention of the Peruvian government, which is, settling the difficulties in regard to Chinese emigration before concluding a general treaty of amity and commerce, he came to the conclusion not to treat Peru with the same politeness, or, as he says, "to regard her in the same light," as the other nations that have made treaties with China. Nevertheless, his imperial highness bases his reluctance "wholly on what he has heard as to the treatment experienced by his countrymen in Peru," saying "that the manner in which that country has acted toward China is so different from the conduct of other nations."

It is painful to see that the distinguished chief of Chinese diplomacy only re-echoes the false reports and exaggerations that have come to his notice. But anybody is to be excused for believing anything if he has not the means of verifying the truth or untruth of the rumors he hears. Rationally thinking, however, it is evident that an employer of a number of laborers is the person most interested in keeping them in the best health and condition; and, in respect to the Peruvians, let the truth be said, that they are proverbially averse to cruelty. The honorable Mr. Low states that the representations made to the Chinese government are strengthened by the fact that so few laborers have ever returned from Peru in comparison to the number who have gone there, and so little can be ascertained as to the actual condition of those still remaining. To the first observation the answer is, that the return is not so easy as from California, for instance, on account of the distance and the absence of a regular line of steamers between the two countries, which is on the point of being established by an English company; that, in point of fact, a great number do return, as statistics show; that formerly the contracts were for a long period of eight years, and the emigrants, after the term of their engagement, having acquired the language and become fond of the country, have settled there, raised families, gone into business, and made fortunes.

In several towns of Peru, and particularly in the city of Lima and commercial ports of the coast, whole districts are occupied exclusively by Chinese store-keepers and merchants, to some of whom ship-loads of goods directly arrive, and thousands of Chinamen, free from their former contracts, are domestics in the houses of the best families; there they gain good salaries, are well treated, do as they please, and if they remain in the country, it is because they wish it.

But, besides all these considerations, the new regulations just made by President Pardo impose on the contractors of Chinese laborers the obligation of returning them to their country when the term of their engagement is over, and this term has also been considerably reduced.

To the second of Mr. Low's observations, in regard to how little can be ascertained as to the condition of Chinese in Peru, the answer is simple. China lives isolated from the world, and cannot learn what passes abroad, and less so in countries with which she maintains no relations; but other governments know well, and always learn when they desire, what transpires in Peru. But here is a mission sent expressly by the Peruvian government for the purpose of giving the government at Peking all the information necessary. Thus the nation I represent shows that she is more interested in the welfare of the Chinese than China herself, whose government seems disinclined to hear what that mission has to say. Prince Kung refers to certain documents, purporting to have been written from Lima, and sent to him from your legation in 1869 and 1871.

On this point I beg to say that my government does not pretend that Peru is entirely free from crime, or that some of its citizens may not commit abuses. The inhabitants of no country are perfectly virtuous and law-abiding, and no government is answerable for all violations of the law by its citizens. But justice ought to be done to all equally, and this is what takes place in the republic of Peru, in which, no separate social classes existing, laws are indistinctly applied to all, and which is governed by free institutions, and now by an administration who is attracting the attention of the world for the liberal measures it is carrying out and the noble motives by which they are inspired.

One of the first acts of President Pardo, on coming into office in August, 1872, was to attend to the condition of Chinese subjects in Peru. He had heard of some abuses having formerly been committed in the country, and a greater number practiced abroad. In regard to Peru, the congress and the President have taken the matter in hand, and now a Chinese finds himself in the republic in the same position as any other foreigners.

For any and all arrangements on this subject my government desires to negotiate directly with the government at Peking, and this is the origin of the mission with which I have been honored.

It seems inconceivable that the Chinese authorities should object to acquire the means of appointing agents in Peru to watch over the interests of their subjects there. If China should finally decide not to treat with Peru, the republic will have done her duty to herself and to the world, and she will have no responsibility for anything that may occur hereafter. One of the practical consequences of such a resolution will be that Peru must have Chinese laborers, (whose numbers have been increasing year by year, and only in 1872 the total of more than 14,000 arrived at Callao.) Private parties will do what they can, the Peruvian government being powerless to prevent abuses in foreign countries.

However, His Imperial Highness Prince Kung says that, but for the reports he has heard, "it is reasonable to admit her proposal (of Peru to enter into a treaty) with demur," and further on declares that the Chinese government "considers that it will not be meet to repel the Peruvians too harshly or finally."

These declarations of his imperial highness show that the determination of the Chinese government, communicated in his dispatch of July 6 to Mr. Low, is not final, and that the prince is willing to enter into negotiations with me under certain conditions.

Nevertheless, I am unwilling to present myself at Tien-tsin, if I were not going to be received there by his excellency the viceroy in a due and proper manner, according to international usages, and in conformity with the representation which I possess as the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of a sovereign state.

It is in this view that I have taken the liberty to trouble you, sir, with this long communication. Availing myself of the friendly disposition of the United States Government toward Peru, and of your own upright character and clear judgment, I earnestly request you to please make known the contents of this dispatch to Prince Kung, and to favor me with your answer, forwarding it to the United States consulate at Shanghai, where I shall wait for it until I hear from you whether the Chinese government will issue the proper orders, so that the Peruvian mission be courteously received at Tien-tsin on its way to Peking.

I take this opportunity to inform you that on the 21st instant I had the honor of signing with His Excellency Toyeshima Tane-orni, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's minister for foreign affairs, a treaty of peace, amity, commerce, and navigation, on the same basis as those which are now in operation between Japan and the other treaty-powers.

Thanking you most sincerely for the kind offices which I have no doubt you will render me, I have the honor to assure you of my highest consideration.

AURELIO GA. Y GARCIA.

[Inclosure 2, in No. 11.]

Mr. Williams to Señor Garcia.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 22, 1873.

SIR: I had the honor on the 10th instant to receive your excellency's dispatch of the 25th ultimo, in reply to that of Mr. Low of the 17th July, in which you have entered very fully into the points alluded to in Prince Kung's dispatch; and on the 15th I had again the honor of receiving your second letter of the 2d instant, inclosing a copy of the preliminary treaty which you have negotiated between Peru and Japan.

In accordance with your request in the first letter, I have made known its contents to Prince Kung, to whom I sent a note requesting a special interview for this purpose. This he allowed me on the 16th instant, and I then stated fully all its leading points. I had no time to put it into Chinese, but I think he clearly understood the main points; and, as there were five of the members of the foreign office present, there was no lack of discussion during the full hour the interview lasted. It may be that some of the points were not so clearly remembered as they would have been if a translation had been placed before them, but, in order to bring the matter to a point, I next day addressed the prince a dispatch, of which I inclose a copy. In it you will see that I suppose a complete statement of the whole question will be made whenever the officials from both countries shall meet at Tien-tsin, and you place in their hands all the facts and arguments in your possession.

The Prince's reply gives you the option, while he declines to appoint a special commissioner of equal rank to meet you at Tien-tsin and negotiate a treaty, for you to address yourself to either the southern or northern superintendents of trade at Nankin or Tien-tsin. They will, no doubt, be instructed to open a correspondence with you. In my interview I insisted on the impropriety of refusing to receive and confer with an envoy sent with the most friendly intentions, from a foreign country, and dismissing him without even hearing what he had to say, even if the Chinese objected to make a treaty. Such a course had not been pursued toward their own envoys in western countries, and it was inconsistent, therefore, with the dignity of a nation to reject that of the Peruvian government in its friendly proposals.

This argument had its weight, no doubt, in modifying their refusal to meet you on the basis of negotiating a treaty. The opportunity of explaining the present condition and prospects of the thousands of Chinese laborers now in Peru, with such an astute official as Ti-Hung-chang, the present governor-general of Chili, will enable you, if you conclude to come to Tien-tsin, to set forth the intentions of the present government of Peru.

In respect to the subject of contract-labor in China, I may be allowed to explain that at present the imperial government is earnestly desirous to put a stop to the manner in which its subjects have been deluded to engage themselves and have been carried off through Macao to foreign countries, from which few of them have ever returned. The atrocities and wrongs connected with this business have left the impression on the minds of those who know anything of the matter that it is equivalent, almost, to a living death for one of their countrymen to be taken away as a coolie. Few or no letters are ever received from those thus shipped away, and their friends, who have no idea of the countries whither they are gone, regard them as dead.

It is to be hoped, even in the interests of humanity, that the present efforts of this government to put a stop to the shipment of coolies from Macao will be entirely successful, and no more ships will find their human cargoes at that port.

If it be, as you remark, that "Peru must have Chinese laborers," let them go there of their own accord. The emigration to California, as you well know, began and has been carried on wholly by the Chinese themselves, and not a cargo of contract-laborers has ever been engaged for that country. In this dispatch it is said that the emigrants, after the term of their engagement, having "acquired the language and become fond of the country, have settled there, raised families, gone into business, and made fortunes, so that in several towns, and particularly in the city of Lima and commercial ports of the coast, whole districts are occupied exclusively by Chinese storekeepers and merchants, to some of whom ship-loads of goods directly arrive; beside these there are thousands engaged as domestics in the houses of the best families, and if they remain in Peru it is because they wish it." If there is such a degree of contentment with their lot, it seems to me that all that is necessary to develop the emigration your government desires, is to encourage these Chinese, now so happily and prosperously settled in Peru, to write for their friends in Canton province and elsewhere to join them, or to help them go home themselves to explain to their townsfolk what an opening is offered them abroad to better their condition. The payment of good wages and a just treatment to all this class of laborers will conclusively prove the sincerity of the present government of the republic to foster them. In a few years, if such a course was pursued, it seems to me the tide of free emigration would begin to flow thither, and those grievances which your excellency has come to China to aid, if possible, in removing by means of a treaty, would cease of themselves. However, if they cannot all be immediately removed, I cannot agree with the opinion now expressed that even if the Chinese government "should finally decide not to treat with Peru, the republic will have done her duty to herself and the world, and she will have no responsibility for anything which may occur hereafter." The existence of abuses toward the Chinese in former times in Peru is acknowledged in this dispatch, and the Chinese government, in trying to protect its ignorant subjects by preventing them engaging themselves as contract-laborers in other lands, to their own damage, is doing the same thing in fact that Peru would do to protect her own citizens, but with indifferent success compared to what the case requires. But I may be permitted to say that responsibility does and must attach to those who encourage the deportation of Chinese laborers in the manner carried on at Macao for the last few years. I have myself resided in that colony, and know something of the wrongs perpetrated upon the natives to beguile or entrap them to go abroad. I cannot believe that there is no better way to get laborers than by contracts, if it be fairly and patiently tried, and no government has a better opportunity than that of Peru to prove its success.

My own opinion respecting the unwillingness of the imperial government to negotiate a treaty with your excellency is, that if they assent and appoint an officer of equal rank to meet you—and this step of itself involves their agreement to enter into contracts for laborers—and while the discussion with the Spanish legation during the past summer has been so excited, they are unwilling to bind themselves with a second power.

I think you would be able to remove many misconceptions in the minds of the officials by coming to Tien-tsin and discussing the whole matter with the governor-general of this province; but whether that would be suitable to your views and position you are the wisest judge.

I avail myself of this occasion to express to your excellency the assurance of my high respect.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 11.]

Mr. Williams to Prince Kung.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 18, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Imperial Highness's dispatch of the 6th of July, addressed to Mr. Low, in which you remark, (alluding to the proposal to send an officer to treat with the Peruvian minister,) "that during the ten and more years which have passed since China has made treaties with other countries, mutual good-will has been shown by all parties; and that now Peru has come for that purpose, it is requisite that she be plainly informed that until she returns all the coolies to their own country, and agrees not to hire any more, no treaty can be made with her."

As soon as this reply was received Mr. Low immediately sent a translation of it to the Peruvian minister at Japan, for his information. I have now received his reply, in which he thus remarks upon the dispatch:

"I have read His Imperial Highness's reply with great attention, and have come to the conclusion that the high officers of China have not yet learned that Peru has adopted a more liberal policy, and that new regulations were passed last year respecting the treatment of the Chinese laborers in that land. By these laws the coolies are placed on a better footing, and have the same rights as others in the courts. These changes in our policy have led to the appointment of a special envoy to the government of China, with whose officers he can personally discuss every point relating to the treatment and position of the coolies, so that hereafter they will have no occasion to complain of the unjust and cruel treatment of their employers in Peru.

"In the Prince's dispatch he states, indeed, that his government has no desire to make a treaty with Peru, and puts it on the ground of the treatment received by Chinese laborers there; but when the minister from Peru meets the one designated by China, then the latter can become thoroughly acquainted with every point connected with this whole matter. It is on this account that I again write to the United States minister at Peking requesting him to communicate these particulars to Prince Kung, and ascertain whether the imperial government will appoint an envoy, a high officer, to meet me at Tien-tsin, there to discuss these things and make a treaty mutually advantageous to both nations."

It is only what is required by common courtesy to make known to your Imperial Highness the purport of the letter which I have received from the Peruvian minister. The government of China has hitherto exhibited the most friendly feelings toward all western nations, and treated them with the respect due to herself and them; and it cannot be supposed that she will repel any one in a rude and abrupt manner.

I take this opportunity, therefore, to inquire whether His Imperial Majesty's government will designate a special officer to proceed to Tien-tsin, there to confer with the Peruvian minister, and on receiving your reply I shall be able to inform him.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew the expression of my high regard.

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

His Imperial Highness Prince KUNG, &c.

[Inclosure 4 in No. 11.—Translation.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

TUNG-CHI, 12th year, 7th moon, 29th day. (September 20, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith sends a reply.

I have been honored with your excellency's dispatch, in which you state: "That as the Peruvian government has sent a special envoy to personally confer with the Chinese authorities respecting the condition of their countrymen in Peru, and their emigration, it is requested that a high officer be appointed to meet him at Tien-tsin to negotiate a treaty; further adding, that as China has hitherto treated foreign nations with friendly courtesy, it is surely very undesirable to rudely reject [the minister from Peru,] &c."

In my former dispatch to Mr. Low I plainly stated the grounds why it was not expedient for this government to make a treaty with that of Peru; and as the minister himself now requests that a high officer be specially appointed to meet him at Tien-tsin, there to confer with him and negotiate a treaty, [I can merely repeat] that His Majesty's government cannot now receive him upon the basis of making a treaty, and there is consequently no occasion for sending an officer to Tien-tsin to meet and negotiate with him.

The high authorities of each province have, however, been accustomed to receive all ministers and high dignitaries who have come to this country, whether from treaty Powers or not, with the courtesy which their position demands, as your excellency, too, yourself, very well knows. If the Peruvian envoy comes to this country, therefore, I presume that there will be no doubt but that the superintendents of trade for the northern and southern ports will not harshly refuse to meet him. But in respect to the negotiations of a treaty, (with Peru,) I can only repeat what I said in my former dispatch: "That when she returns to their houses in China all the coolies whom she has hired as laborers, and agrees to enter into no more contracts for laborers, then this government will make a treaty with her."

It is in this sense that I now send this reply for your excellency's information.

S. WELLS WILLIAMS,

United States Chargé d'Affaires to China.

Señor Garcia to Mr. Williams.

LEGATION OF PERU IN CHINA AND JAPAN,

Shanghai, October 10, 1873.

SIR: On arriving at this port on the 7th instant I received the note, dated 22d September, which you have kindly written to me in reply to mine of August 25, relative to my mission in this empire, and inclosing copies of your dispatch, dated September 18, to Prince Kung, and of his answer to you of 20th of the same month.

Allow me, sir, in the first place, to express my thankfulness for the promptitude with which you have taken the necessary steps near the imperial government, requesting a special interview and addressing a communication to Prince Kung, in order to remove the prejudices which seemed to exist in the high officers of the government there. Your friendly action has certainly produced this result—that the Chinese government has understood the responsibility that would weigh upon them if the envoy of Peru, sent out here with so humane and friendly purposes, was not received at Tien-tsin as the minister of any other sovereign state, whether it be or not a treaty Power. I am flattered by the hope that you will please continue lending me your good offices; and I trust it will be so with greater reason, since the representative of the United States, on account of the absence of the other foreign agents from Peking, is precisely the only one who may now be addressed by the first envoy of another American republic, who aspires with most laudable aims to enter into relations with this Oriental nation.

Your interesting note, to which I now reply, embraces various important points. I am exceedingly obliged to you for the frank expression of your opinions on Chinese emigration and the subject of contract-labor. I quite agree with you on many of them; in regard to others, there is room for discussion, and I would very much like to have, at present, sufficient time to express to you my ideas. I beg you will allow me to postpone doing so for another occasion.

Confining myself to the direct question which is the object of my own dispatch to Prince Kung, and of his answer, I see that the prince insists for the present on his first ideas about the negotiation of a treaty, but declares "that as the high authorities of each province have been accustomed to receive all ministers and high dignitaries who have come to this country, whether from treaty powers or not, with the courtesy which their position demands," the Peruvian minister may enter into communication with the superintendents of trade for the northern or southern ports.

Upon this, you express the opinion that I "would be able to remove many misconceptions in the minds of the officials by going to Tien-tsin, and discussing the whole matter with the governor-general of that province."

It follows from this that the imperial government not only does not invite me to go on to Peking, but does not even accept your suggestion of their "appointing a special commissioner of equal rank to meet me at Tien-tsin." Allow me to say frankly that I have constantly believed, as my government now believes, that although such has been the general practice of the Chinese government, after the admission at Peking of the Austro-Hungarian envoy, and the facilities he received there, the representative of the Peruvian republic ought also to be treated with equal favor, particularly as the special affair which he comes to discuss is of such great moment.

I think, also, and you will agree with me, that bringing, as I bring, an autograph letter from the President of Peru, which I must deliver to His Majesty the Emperor, this important fact must be taken into account by his imperial highness Prince Kung, in order that my stay at Tien-tsin be as short as possible, specially in view of the approach of winter, which makes locomotion so difficult, and the unhealthiness of the place due to the last inundations.

Permit me to close this dispatch, informing you that on the 14th day of this month I shall leave Shanghai for Tien-tsin, where I beg you to favor me with your esteemed communications, (care of the United States consul,) and from where I shall forward to you my next one.

I beg to renew to you, sir, the assurances of my respect and consideration.

AURELIO GA. Y GARCIA.

[Inclosure 6 in No. 11.—Translation.]

Señor Garcia to Mr. Williams.

TIENTSIN, October 25, 1873.

MY DEAR SIR: In accordance with what I had the honor of stating to you in my last official dispatch, dated the 10th instant, I left Shanghai on the 14th, but arrived here only on the 23d, on account of delays caused by unfavorable weather suffered at Che-foo and the Taku Bar.

At the same time that I received your note of September 22, communicating to me Prince Kung's second dispatch to your legation about my mission in his empire, I received your polite private letter of September 18. Thanking you for it, now please allow me to address you the present one of the same nature, and to inform you of the steps I have taken since my arrival at Tien-tsin in connection with the object for which my government has sent me to China.

As an act of courtesy, and following the custom established by other foreign ministers, on the 23d I wrote a note to his excellency Ti-Hung-chang, announcing my arrival, and informing him that I would have the honor of presenting to him personally my respects on the next day (24th) if that time would suit him. He at once answered courteously, showing his readiness to receive me on that day, and "have a conversation with me," but fixing the hour of 4 o'clock, as he was engaged at 2 o'clock.

I made my call, accompanied by my secretary of legation and by Mr. John A. T. Meadows, as interpreter, both of whom I announced in my note to the viceroy. His excellency received me with sufficient external courtesy. * * * * The interview lasted just an hour and a half, as the viceroy after a few minutes initiated a conversation on the emigration ("carrying away," as he called it) of Chinese to Peru, and the wrongs they suffered there, which was in toto the repetition of Prince Kung's statements in his note of July 6, to Mr. Low, to whose communications to the Tsungli Yamun he also referred.

As you are in possession of the prince's notes, and of my dispatches to your legation in regard to them, I shall not repeat here the arguments I employed against Ti-Hung-chang's observations; the final tendency of those arguments being to make him comprehend that he was mistaken on many points; that there was untruth and exaggeration in the reports he had heard; and that, if there is a misunderstanding between our two governments, I am on the spot, representing my own, with full powers to enter into any honorable agreement with the government of China. But he said again that no treaty could be made until Peru returned all the coolies that had gone there, of whom "nine-tenths," he said, had died there; paying no attention to my replies that those assertions were destroyed by the fact of there existing in Peru about one hundred thousand Chinese; and that besides, my government could not send away against their will peaceful inhabitants who were contented with their lot, as by Peruvian law that would be deportation, a punishment only to be inflicted on criminals in virtue of the sentence of a court of justice. And when I added that such a deportation, if it were possible, would hurt the Chinese more than anybody else, as thousands of them have set up trades that give them lucrative results, the abandonment of which would make them lose the capital they have accumulated by their labor; that they are satisfied with that life, as is proved by the fact of their not leaving the country, although they possess the means of doing so, and nobody hinders them; and that when official relations are established between both countries, those facts could be observed by the proper Chinese officers, who would be enabled to make their representations to the competent authorities, in case complaints did exist; then Mr. Ti-Hung-chang answers with great assurance, that if foreigners went to Peru their statements could not be believed; that if Chinese commissioners went, they would be detained there by the Peruvians and prevented from coming back; and that no Chinese mandarin would go. Finally, the viceroy ended as he began, by doubting all I said.

He suddenly changed the conversation by asking me whether I had visited the customs Taotai. I replied that I had not, and that as I had just announced officially my arrival to him, (the viceroy,) I expected the Taotai's first visit. On this point also there was a disagreeable discussion; and on his direct question, whether I proposed to visit the Taotai, I replied, "No; not until he visits me."

Afterward, Ti-Hung-chang asked me at what house I was stopping, and then for how long I had taken it; to which I answered I had not taken it for any fixed time. He next told me that he would return my visit to-morrow (26th) at 10 o'clock; and the conversation ended.

I have purposely entered into these details so that you may appreciate exactly the facts. In view of my last dispatch to you, written at Shanghai, and of the circumstances I now communicate, I earnestly hope you will adopt such a course as your good judgment may suggest, in order to point out to the Peking government the mistaken, and to them injurious, path they have adopted, due exclusively to the very peculiar and extraordinary manner of transacting diplomatic affairs in China.

I have come to this empire with a most honorable mission, which my government has intrusted to me. This mission directly interests the Chinese people, at least as much as it does Peru. There exists a misunderstanding between the two governments in regard to certain occurrences, true or false, which belong to the past. I am now here, which makes it possible that an understanding may be arrived at for the future between both parties.

Only a few miles separate me from the central government to which I am accredited; but before I reach Peking I meet an officer, a very high one it is true, of China, who abruptly commences to treat with me about my business, without the least knowledge of it or of my country, without telling me that he is duly authorized to negotiate with me, and who ends by saying (an Asiatic, or rather, Chinese fashion, probably,) that he doubts my statements.

I now hope that, as the season of the year does not allow me to remain indefinitely at Tien-tsin, and if I am to conduct my negotiations at Peking, I must know it within a very short time, you will do me a real service by finding out and letting me know the intentions and the way of proceeding of the Chinese government, who in any case ought to know that I have not come to beg favors of them nor to submit to their caprices.

It is painful to me to have to trouble you in this manner, but I am convinced that the present minister of the United States, who knows so profoundly the history of the middle kingdom, and who has so ably described the development of foreign intercourse in this empire, will take interest in assisting to disentangle an international situation such as probably has never presented itself before.

I shall always be happy to hear from you, officially or privately, begging you to address your communications to care of the consulate of the United States.

Thanking you again for your kind action,

I am, my dear sir, &c.,

AURELIO GA. Y GARCIA.

Hon. S. WELLS WILLIAMS, &c.

P. S.—Having learned here that M. de Geoffroy, minister of the French Republic, has returned to Peking, I also write to him to-day on the subject of the present letter.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Peking, November 24, 1873. (Received January 26, 1874.)

SIR: In continuance of my recent dispatch, (No. 9, of 6th November,) I have now the honor to send you the remaining papers connected with the adjustment of the differences between the Spanish chargé d'affaires and this government.

Soon after the date of Baron Holleben's letter of the 24th ultimo, and the interview with the Yamun on the 30th, referred to in my dispatch, at which the draft of a protocol in two articles was presented on behalf of M. Otin, the Chinese officials, having had time to reconsider their declinature of that mode of arranging the matter, sent an informal note, signed by the prince, on the 7th instant, accepting it in substance. (Inclosure 1;) their conference with Messrs. Macpherson and Huber had probably tended, too, to convince them that M. Otin's proposal did not necessarily interfere with the freedom of their own commission, but was a courtesy required by the intercourse of nations, the rejection of which would only recoil on themselves.

The Spanish chargé d'affaires thereupon resumed his official relations with the prince, and a circular-note to this effect was issued on the 12th. (Inclosure 2.) The hesitation and unwillingness of the officials to admit, or even discuss, the articles of the first protocol were, I think, chiefly owing to their impression that, if a Spanish officer was in any way connected with their deputies, it must necessarily neutralize the whole investigation. However, every point having been cleared up, and the terms of agreement settled, a protocol in four articles was signed on the 21st instant, between M. Otin and three members of the Yamun. It insures the entire freedom of the Chinese commission when it reaches Cuba, and in the Chinese text asks the good offices and support of the local authorities in the same terms that it asks the advice of the foreign consuls. In the English text the support of the former is even more explicitly granted.

In his letter of the 21st instant, (inclosure 3,) sending me the two versions of his agreement, (inclosure 4,) he has requested my aid in the arbitration which may be necessary on the return of the commission and reception of its report. I have agreed to act on the matter, (inclosure 5,) as have also the other ministers, excepting the Russian, who is just now absent. One of the questions which will certainly be brought forward then will be the amount of indemnity to be paid by this government for damage and loss incurred by the alleged violation of its treaty obligations to allow Spanish agents to contract for coolies. This protocol carefully omits the word indemnity, but the fourth and fifth articles of the other contain the pith of what the Chinese will resist if it is demanded, as they look upon it as a mulct, because they have tried to protect their subjects from misery and disappointment by forbidding contract-emigration to Cuba.

M. Otin has left Peking to spend the winter in Shanghai and return in the spring, when he expects the return of the commission. Messrs. Macpherson and Huber are now there, ready to leave by the next American mail. I can only here repeat my strong desire that you will give all the countenance and help to this commission which can properly be given to it; but especially that you will bear me out in my promise given to Prince Kung in my reply of September 5, (dispatch No. 9, inclosure 5,) and instruct the United States consul-general at Havana to aid it in going into a thorough inquiry of the matter.

The energy shown by the Canton authorities in arresting kidnapers, and putting the people on their guard against the wiles practiced to get them down to Macao, which has so materially reduced the coolie-traffic there, is, in a great measure, owing to Mr. Low's information, given to the government here, and his remonstrances at their apathy over the great wrongs committed by native brokers. Now that the Emperor has gone further, and sent a special commission of inquiry as a further step in these efforts to restrict, if he cannot abolish, emigration by contract, it is very desirable that every encouragement be afforded its members in prosecuting their inquiries. If the moral support and experience of the consuls of the five powers be honestly enlisted on their side, it will do much to effect an untrammelled examination, and neutralize the jealousy or intimidation which the rulers or the planters in Cuba might otherwise show. The first proposal of M. Otin to appoint two Spanish assessors, and make up a mixed commission, composed of Chinese, Spanish, and consular members, would have crippled all fair inquiry; and the Yamen was right in rejecting the proposal. But I am afraid, after all, that the Cuban authorities will endeavor in some way to make the inquiry partial, and keep the coolies out of the reach of their countrymen, or frighten them from telling the truth; and herein the foreign consuls, especially the American and British, can, it appears to me, help them materially.

Now that this government, after much urging and hesitation, has organized a commission of inquiry into the condition of its subjects abroad, it is very desirable that what is good in the effort may, by its success, so far justify the wisdom which planned it as to lead to further similar designs and attempts.

I have, &c.,

Prince Kung presents his compliments.

In relation to the commission about to be sent to inquire into the condition of the coolies in Cuba, it now appears that there has been a difference of views between us in some particulars, but there is a way in which the affair can now be arranged without difficulty.

The commissioners now appointed shall conduct their investigation uncontrolled by any one, but they shall confer with all the foreign ministers in Peking before leaving, as to the mode of procedure. When the commission returns it will present a clear report to the foreign office, which, after it has been carefully examined in all its details and verbal explanations, will be submitted to the body of resident ministers for their discussion. The manner of settling the affair between China and Spain must then come up for their careful consideration, for which we shall have to be further indebted.

As I write to inform you of this, I also beg to wish you happiness, and inclose my card.

The members of the foreign office present their compliments.

We have lately received a dispatch from Mr. Otin, Spanish chargé d'affaires, in which he says: The points of disagreement between the foreign office and myself have now all been submitted to the dean of the diplomatic body in Peking, who has carefully examined them and brought about an honorable and fair accord upon them all. In consequence of this, I have resumed the post and duties of acting minister of Spain.

We have replied to Mr. Otin in the same sense, acknowledging him as chargé d'affaires for Spain, and beg now, by this note, particularly to thank you, sir, for the trouble which you have taken in this affair.

Wishing you daily happiness as we write, we inclose our cards.

Peking, November 21, 1873.

M. le Chargé d'Affaires and dear Colleague: I have the honor to transmit to you herewith the bases agreed upon by the Tsungli Yamun and the legation of Spain for a definitive arrangement of our differences upon the subject of Chinese emigration under contract to the island of Cuba.

The kind mediation which you have already had the goodness to extend to us, with a view to reconciliation, now encourages me to solicit the cooperation of your experience in the conference of arbitration which is to give solution to this matter, and to beg you to obtain from Cuba, in such manner as you may deem proper, all the information which shall seem to you calculated to throw light upon this question.

Be pleased to accept, &c.,

Copy of protocol.

In the matter of Chinese emigration to Cuba, the two powers (China and Japan) have agreed on the following points:

1st. China may send a commission to Cuba to ascertain the condition of Chinese coolies. The officers thus deputed by China will prosecute their inquiries in Cuba independently and by themselves, but may ask the advice of foreign consuls and the good offices and support of the Spanish authorities.

2d. The two powers (Spain and China) will in advance request the representatives at Peking of England, Russia, France, the United States, and Germany to take the whole question into consideration, and, when the time arrives, arbitrate thereon.

3d. When the report of the Chinese officers shall have been received, the Chinese foreign board will communicate a copy of it to each of the arbitrators and to the Spanish representative; the original document will be lodged with the arbitrators at the time of arbitration. Consular reports concerning the condition of coolies, if intended to be used in evidence, are to be communicated to the Chinese foreign board and to the Spanish representative; if not thus communicated they are not to be used as evidence.

4th. The correspondence between the Spanish representative and the Chinese foreign board on the question of Cuba, coolies is to be handed to the arbitrating ministers, in order that all the points therein discussed may be together placed before the arbitrators for common and definitive settlement.

Done at Peking the 21st of November, 1873.

Sealed and signed.

M. le Chargé d'Affaires, and Dear Colleague:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, and to thank you for the copy of the protocol which you signed that day with the three ministers of the foreign office, defining the status and procedure of the commission and the mode of final arbitration.

I beg to congratulate you upon this basis of agreement, which fully meets my view of the understanding arrived at on the 1st of August. The elucidation of the results of Chinese emigration to Cuba during the last twenty-five years will have much effect upon the whole question of contract-labor, and every one who has a regard for the welfare of his fellow-men must desire to see a full and untrammelled inquiry into the matter.

I shall be very willing to lend my aid in the final settlement of the points which may still come up between the Spanish and Chinese governments after the return of the commission, and help to bring this perplexing question to a peaceful and just conclusion.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew the expression of my great regard.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 23, 1874. (Received March 27.)

SIR: I have the honor to send you a series of papers connected with the purchase of the mission premises of the American Southern Presbyterian Mission at Hang-chow, by the gentry of that city, and I am sure that their perusal will gratify you as indicating a very friendly state of feeling toward the missionaries. They deserve to be read, too, in connection with the inclosures in Mr. Low's dispatch of October 23, 1872, (No. 202,) if only to learn the contrast in the sentiments of the people and their rulers; and this friendliness is likely to be promoted and strengthened by their co-operation with our countrymen in making the exchange.

The gentry who have paid for the mission property are probably remunerated in the value of the premises now obtained, but the way in which these literati have gone about the accomplishment of their object and the regard which they have shown to the rights of foreigners are both unusual, and give some importance to this transaction. I hope the example will not be lost as a precedent in future similar negotiations, but it can now be taken as an encouraging sign of the improved intercourse between the two parties in that city.

Hang-chow is one of the finest cities in China for situation, and was its capital for one hundred and fifty years, (A. D. 1129-1280.) So far as is known, this hill was then occupied chiefly by temples and other similar public buildings, and not by imperial palaces. It was always a spot for the resort of the people. In 1862, when the Taiping rebels destroyed the city, the temples and other edifices were all leveled on this hill, and have not yet been rebuilt, though the city is rapidly regaining its prosperity by the return of the inhabitants and restoration of the government offices.

In a visit to it in 1859, in the days of its affluence, I observed that the top of this hill was open and used by the citizens for their diversions, and that the temple grounds were of large extent. In very few Chinese cities can such a dominating spot, according to the tenets of the geomancers, be found; and if its good luck was supposed to be interfered with, no pains would be spared to remove the irritating cause. As intimated by Mr. Lord, it was probably the height, the singularity, and the conspicuousness of the mission-houses which made them obnoxious to the notions of the gentry, more than their mere existence.

I think it may safely be inferred that the adjustment of the difficulty in 1872 growing out of this cause, so different from the sad result of a similar popular ill-feeling at Tien-tsin in 1870, may in part be ascribed to the good name which the Protestant missionaries have obtained for themselves during their seven years' residence there. Nearly all of the eight missionaries living in Hang-chow have families, and they invite the people into their chapels, schools, and hospitals, mix with them daily, and are soon well known, so that when ugly rumors arise among the ignorant, this publicity has the effect of neutralizing them, and furnishes to the well-disposed arguments to induce their countrymen to examine for themselves. The present friendly arrangement, under the careful management of Mr. Lord, will not diminish this favorable opinion. The Chinese are the slaves of the mysterious cabala of the geomancers, and yet it is impossible to get a satisfactory explanation of the laws which govern it, for it is really too crude and fanciful to bear examination.

I send you all the important documents connected with the exchange of premises, (inclosure,) and copy of my reply, (inclosure 2;) and would respectfully suggest that your opinion of Mr. Lord's conduct in the transaction may be officially made known to him.

Mr. Lord to Mr. Williams.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Ningpo, November 17, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, for your information and approval or otherwise, an account of a transaction recently concluded between myself and the local authorities of Hang-chow, our provincial capital.

You are probably aware that soon after the ratification of the treaties betwixt China and England, France, Russia, and the United States, a number of missionaries connected with different organizations in England and the United States located themselves in this city. As at that time it was generally supposed that the right for missionaries to reside in the interior was guaranteed by the treaties, the missionaries arranged for a permanent residence in that city. They bought or rented lands, built houses and chapels, established schools and hospitals, and arranged generally for extended and permanent work. The people appeared friendly, and the officials manifested no hostility. The city had been greatly desolated during its occupation by the rebels and the imperial soldiery; so that unoccupied lands were plentiful, and for a time not very difficult to be obtained.

The city of Hang-chow lies mostly on the plain; but there are mountains surrounding it on the west. A spur of one of the adjacent hills extends within the limits of the city wall, to the distance of half a mile or more, and is elevated in its highest parts several hundred feet. This hill, as I suppose hills in Chinese cities usually are, seems to be regarded with some degree of veneration. At least its connection with fung-shuy is supposed to be of great importance. Moreover, it is a kind of park or common, much resorted to by the people, especially by visitors during the provincial examinations and religious festivals. The views from this hill are pleasant; and a residence on it would be more quiet, and one would naturally suppose more healthful, than on the plain.

Influenced probably by considerations of this kind, the Reverend Mr. Inslee, at that time representative of the Southern Presbyterian Mission, sought and obtained ground situated on the northern slope of the hill on which to erect mission-buildings. Mr. Inslee's successors retained this situation, and enlarged and increased the mission-buildings. The situation of these buildings is nearly in front of, and only a short distance removed from, the office of the Fan-tai, or provincial treasurer, though at the time this circumstance was not noticed, or, if noticed, was not thought to be of any consequence. Not long, however, after these buildings were erected, there were, it is said, several cases of sickness and death in this officer's family. The idea was started, and the idea was confirmed by the government, that the fung-shuy had been disturbed by the position and form of these houses, and that these calamities had come upon him in consequence. The matter seems to have been discussed among the officials and their friends, and no doubt a good deal of feeling existed in regard to it. The first expression of this feeling observed by the missionaries was in the spring of last year, in the appearance of a placard denouncing foreigners and threatening all natives with punishment who should rent or sell any more places to them. A copy of this placard was sent to me, and I forwarded it with a translation to the legation. I also thought it of sufficient importance to call to it the attention of the lieutenant-governor, and urge him to repress such hostile and inflammatory proceedings. His reply was friendly, and there was no more trouble until the autumn, when suddenly warrants were issued for the arrest of all persons known to have sold or leased houses or lands to foreigners. The matter was of course at once brought to the notice of the British consul and myself, and our action in regard to it you are already acquainted with. After this storm passed, there was a calm for several months; indeed, I heard no more of the matter until the latter part of the past summer. I then had some intimation, not through the missionaries, that an effort would be made to secure, through friendly negotiation, the removal of the mission-buildings on the hill, which had really been the cause of all the previous difficulty.

A week or two later I was waited on by a deputation from the gentry of Hang-chow, accompanied and introduced by a native gentleman residing at Ningpo, who presented to me a petition (inclosure No. 1) to the effect that the mission-houses on the hill in Hang-chow were obnoxious; and that if the missionaries would consent to remove to some other place they would cause a suitable place to be procured for them, and payment to be made them to cover their expenses.

The further history of this transaction I think you will best learn from the inclosed correspondence. I will here add only one or two particulars, which the correspondence does not contain.

On my arrival in Hang-chow I called on the principal officials, namely, the lieutenant-governor, provincial treasurer, and prefect, all of whom promptly returned my calls. They all seemed well acquainted with my business there. They talked about it freely, and thanked me with apparent sincerity for the trouble I was taking in the matter. They also spoke kindly and gratefully of the missionaries, who had been willing to entertain their proposition, and who were ready to accede to their request, at the expense of their own personal inconvenience.

You will observe that the only reason assigned in the accompanying petition and dispatch of the Chinese for the removal of these buildings is that which regards fung-shuy. I may add that no other reason was mentioned in my conversation with them. I have the impression, however, that, in point of fact, this was not the only, and perhaps the stronger, reason. The idea of having foreigners located on the hill at all, or where they would be particularly conspicuous to officials and scholars continually visiting the hill, was to them disagreeable. While foreigners were thus in the way, the local authorities were liable to be criticised and censured for it. And it is quite possible, also, that they had some apprehensions that in time the matter might lead to some popular disturbance.

In conclusion, I may remark that in the conduct of this affair I have spared neither time nor effort to get it arranged, and arranged in such a way as would be just and satisfactory to all concerned. And so far I have every reason to believe that both parties are satisfied, both with the arrangement made and with my efforts in effecting it. The assurance of this affords me satisfaction, and this satisfaction I accept as my chief reward.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD C. LORD,
United States Consul.

[Inclosure 1 in 1 in No. 17.]

(Received August 5, 1873.)

Petition addressed to Mr. Lord, United States Consul, Ningpo.

The undersigned, Wang Ju-lin, Yang Hung-quen, Liu Shih, Hwang Fah-mou, Luh Yuen-ting, Yang P'u, Chow Kwang-kw'ei, and Sun I-shin, of the gentry of Hang-chow, present the following petition:

In consequence of the fung-shuy (or prosperous influences) of this place having been disturbed, and the minds of the people disquieted, your petitioners unite in the earnest request that you will of your clemency permit, and use your influence to effect, the change which will bring about the needed harmony.

Your petitioners regard the hill in Hang-chow, called Kwan-mi, as dominating the prosperous influences of the whole city. Hitherto, although the people have built houses on it, they have been low and small, and occasioned no obstruction to the look-out of the spot. Of late years, persons of the place sold ground to some missionaries of your country on which to erect mission-buildings; and we are well aware that to do so, and propagate religion, is permitted by treaty and cannot be prevented either by officers or people.

Now, the doctrines of geomancy, although not esteemed in the faith of your country, are, in the estimation of the people of China, of the highest value and consequence. Since these buildings were erected many untoward things have occurred among the people, owing, it is generally said, to them; which, as they stand exactly opposite to the great hall of the provincial treasurer's office, injure and destroy its aspect. Thus the minds of the people have been and continue to be disturbed in a very great degree.

Now, it seems to your petitioners that as the missionaries of your country are anxious to propagate religion they must also be anxious to pacify the people, for when people's minds are quiet religion can be diffused without limit or bounds. Wherefore we, your petitioners, unitedly pray that you will regard their request, and aid them in effecting the desired removal.

There being much unoccupied land in Hang-chow, your petitioners are willing to procure at their own expense a place such as will be agreeable to the missionaries. They will also, for the expenses necessary to be incurred in rebuilding, pay them the full price of their present buildings.

You, Mr. Consul, have resided long in Ningpo, and are thoroughly acquainted with the customs of the people; your conduct has ever been influenced by a regard for them, and they hold you in grateful remembrance. We therefore intreat you to request the missionaries to consent to exchange their location, in order that the prosperous influences there may be preserved, and the harmonies of the spot carried out. For doing this, our gratitude will truly be boundless.

A respectful petition,

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 6th intercalary moon.

Mr. Lord to the missionaries Houston and Helm.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Ningpo, August 15, 1873.

DEAR SIRS: You are aware, I suppose, that the movement in your city last year directed against natives who had transferred, or aided in transferring, houses or lands to foreigners, was at the time supposed to have originated in a particular dislike that some of the officials, and perhaps gentry, had to your position and houses on the hill. It is true that this fact was not mentioned to me and my colleague in the discussions that we had with the officers at that time. Still, we knew well enough that the difficulty had originated there.

The movement referred to was unreasonable and anarchical; for which reason, perhaps, we were the better able to get it arrested; the magistrates, themselves, no doubt becoming alarmed when called to face the storm they were raising. After our protests no further arrests were made, and the persons already arrested were soon released; moreover, the proclamation deemed necessary to quiet the minds of the people was issued in accordance with our request. From that time to the present, so far as I know, there has been no action on the part of the officers or people calculated to disturb foreigners.

However, I have suspected that neither the officers nor people were, or would be, satisfied to have your houses remain where they are, and recently this suspicion has been confirmed by a petition presented to me asking for their removal. I will briefly state the history (so far as it is known to me) and import of this petition, before expressing any opinion in regard to the attention which it should receive.

About a month ago, a native gentleman of this place, of high standing and influence, called on me and stated that the gentry of Hang-chow had consulted with him in regard to the mission-houses on the hill in that place, and the possibility of getting them removed. He did not state to me what advice, if any, he had given to the gentry of Hang-chow. But he said that they had decided to bring the matter before me; they would unite in a petition, and they would be glad to present their petition respectfully through a deputation representing their body, if I would permit them. I replied, of course, that if they had any grievance in regard to the matter referred to, which they wished to present to me, they had a right to present it, and it was my duty to give it the consideration it might deserve. As for the deputation, this did not appear to me a matter of much importance; still, if they chose to send one, I had no objection; it might supplement their petition, and explain more fully what they wanted.

About a week ago this deputation, consisting of three gentlemen from Hang-chow, and the gentlemen above mentioned, belonging to Ningpo, waited on me, and presented their petition. The petition contained the names of the three gentlemen present from Hang-chow, and five others, who, it was said, would also have been present but for the difficulty of leaving home. Both the petition and the statements of the deputation convinced me that the matter was by them considered of very great importance.

It was stated that the houses occupied by your mission on the hill were but a short distance from, and over against one or two of, the principal official residences; in consequence of which, according to their notions, the fung-shuy was disturbed, and their residences were rendered liable to the visitation of evil influences. It was said, too, that Hang-chow was the provincial capital, and also the residence of a large number of officers and scholars, by whom the doctrine of fung-shuy was universally and sincerely believed, and by whom the regulations in regard to it were considered to be of very great importance. Now these regulations, it was said, were violated by these houses being where they are. The officers and people, therefore, were anxious to get them removed. But, in asking to have them removed, they were willing to indemnify their owners for any loss that they might sustain. They would see that they were provided with a suitable place elsewhere, and be enabled to erect (or they would erect for them if they preferred) buildings as good as those that they now have. In short, they would leave me to decide what was just and reasonable in the matter of compensation. This is the history and import of the matter as it has come before me.

Now, in presenting it for your consideration, I will call your attention to a few points which I think you should keep in view.

I. In the first place, it is a settled question, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, that missionaries have no treaty-right to reside in China elsewhere than at the open ports. This matter has to some extent been misunderstood. But it is known now that the clause in the French treaty, from which it was supposed the right of missionaries to reside in the interior was derived, does not exist in the French text, which alone, in cases of discrepancy, is to be regarded as authoritative. Moreover, irrespective of the French treaty or any other, our Government has decided that it is impolitic to claim from the Chinese government rights for missionaries not claimed for other citizens. I mention this fact as one important to be borne in mind in settling difficulties of this kind. The Chinese are dissatisfied with your present location on the hill, and they ask you to exchange it for one somewhere else. You may have thought, and so you may very naturally say, "We are here by right; why, then, are we asked to remove?" But just here is the mistake. "Your right," replies our Government, "to reside on the hill, or in Hang-chow, at all, is only such as the Chinese give you. We are willing and pleased to have you reside there, if you can do so with their consent." Now, it seems hardly necessary for me to add, that in order to obtain and secure this consent it may be necessary at times to concede something to their prejudices. To reside on the plain with their consent and good will I should judge to be far better policy than to insist on remaining on the hill without them.

II. I remark, in the second place, that, however little or much the ruling classes at Hang-chow knew or cared about your position on the hill at first, there can be no doubt but that it has now become among them a matter of notoriety and concern. The present movement is proof enough of this. I think that all classes of Chinese in Hang-chow are peaceably disposed toward foreigners; but they are, of course, capable of being irritated, and, with this standing cause of irritation among them, it would be no strange thing if in time it led to the disturbance of the peace you now enjoy, or even to acts of wrong and outrage. Indeed, my opinion is that the feeling on this subject is already too deep and wide-spread to be safely ignored.

III.—The present method adopted by the Chinese to get rid of what is to them a grievance seems to be just, and even generous. It admits that your being where you are is no fault of yours. It is a mistake, (as they look at it,) harmless perhaps to you, but disastrous to them. They courteously ask you to change your location, and they offer to pay your expenses in doing so.

IV. By your acceding to their proposition, I think I can secure to you a location that will in most respects, if not in all, be as eligible as that which you now have; and, in addition to this, succeed in placing you and all the missionaries in Hang-chow on a safer and better footing. In this way the conflict that commenced a year ago will be well ended, and the Chinese will have had at least one proof that the better way to redress their grievances against foreigners is not by violence and wrong, but by law and order; and if this lesson is learned by them to any extent, you cannot fail to see how great a boon it must be to us all.

V. In conclusion, I have to say that I am strongly of the opinion that you ought to accede to the request that the Chinese have made. I think it will be for your own interest, and for the interest of your fellow-missionaries. And I suppose I hardly need say that, if you do accede to their request, I will use my best endeavors to secure you every interest and convenience that may seem just and practicable.

The Chinese are anxious to have the matter decided as soon as possible; so I trust you will let me hear from you on the subject at your earliest convenience.

I am, sirs, your obedient servant,

EDWARD C. LORD,
United States Consul.

Rev. M. HALE HOUSTON,
Rev. B. HELM,

Missionaries of the Southern Presbyterian Board of Missions, Hang-chow.

[Inclosure 3 in 1 in No. 17.]

Rev. B. Helm to Mr. Lord.

HANG-CHOW, August 22, 1873.

RESPECTED AND DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt on yesterday (21st) of your recent communication to Mr. Houston and myself, with regard to a petition presented by some gentlemen of Hang-chow, who desired through you to secure the removal of the foreign houses occupied by the Southern Presbyterian Mission on the hill known as the Kwan-me hill.

The above-mentioned letter I have forwarded to my colleagues, and our mission will act on the matter and return you an answer as soon as possible. In the meantime, permit me to express to you individually my thanks for your kind and full letter.

If the gentlemen who waited on you are really authorized to act for the citizens of this city, then my own opinion is that, owing to their courteous manner of relieving themselves of what they consider to be a grievance, it becomes our duty as Christians and citizens to comply, notwithstanding the great inconvenience and injury we must necessarily experience in the change proposed. If left to our own free will, we would not for any sum of money again spend our time in brick and mortar instead of preaching Christ crucified to perishing souls. Money cannot compensate this; but duty may demand it. Secondly, the healthiness and comfort of our present place would by no means be relinquished merely for money, did not some higher motive enter. Both of these considerations ought to be borne in mind when any estimate of our loss is considered.

Building now costs (I am safe, I think, in saying) one-fourth to one-third more than when we built. Stone and tiles and wood and brick are all selling much in advance. For example, tiles sold for $18 per ten thousand are now $23.

I should feel it necessary, in entering into any agreement of so much importance and delicacy, that you should give it official sanction on the one side, while in some way it should receive the same on the native side, that there might be confidence; and in case of perfidy, redress might be obtained.

The native gentlemen ought to secure us a lot in a part of the city both healthy and suitable for our work, else as missionaries we could not occupy it; and we should keep possession of our present premises till we had houses in the new ones suitable to move into, when they could do as seemeth them best with the present buildings. Your official sanction should be a guarantee to them of good faith on our part.

You will excuse me for making these suggestions now, while they occur to me. They may assist you in any conference with the native gentlemen. I have no authority to speak for our mission as a body, but feel sure it will accede to your request, so courteous and just under the circumstances. If further negotiations are proceeded with, I suppose it would be necessary to ask you to continue to act for us, or at least counsel with us, and give your sanction to what may be done. Our mission can appoint a committee to confer with you, and settle the terms as well as select the site, if it accedes to the request. It would be useless to prove that, according to their own belief, one of our houses is not in front, and could not interfere with the fung-shuy.

If the body of the people and officials are determined on a change, we ought to yield. And the petition seems sent in, and a speedy answer required, so as to have the opportunity during the examinations of abating a nuisance anyhow, should we refuse. Mr. Houston is in Chefoo and Mr. Du Bose in Shanghai. Your letter has been forwarded, and an answer will be returned as soon as possible. In the meantime I have the honor to remain, respectfully, yours,

BEN HELM.

E. C. LORD, Esq.,
United States Consul, Ningpo.

P. S.—Might I request the names of the parties who visited you? We here could readily tell whether they are representative men, or of a family who gave Mr. Jenkins trouble, and whose head was an official at Tien-Tsin at the time of the massacre. I judge the case is as they represent it, but it would be a satisfaction to us to be sure it is so in acting.

Respectfully, yours,

B. H.

[Inclosure 4 in 1 in No. 17.]

Rev. M. H. Houston to Mr. Lord.

HANG-CHOW, September 9, 1873.

DEAR SIR: On my return here to-day, from Chefoo, my colleague, Mr. Helm, and I consulted together about the proposition made by certain of the Chinese in this city, through you, which was communicated to us in your favor of August 15, viz, that the property now held by the Southern Presbyterian Mission on the hill in this city be given up in exchange for property in another part of the city. Your letter had been forwarded to me in Chefoo by Mr. Helm, and on my arrival here to-day he read me his reply, and also your second letter of August 26. I have only to say that the views expressed by Mr. Helm in regard to the matter are my own, and while I feel, as a missionary, that it is a grievous thing to be turned aside from our high and distinctive work to engage in the task of laying out land and building houses, I do not doubt that it is our duty to accept the proposition which has been made, and I trust we shall find that any sacrifice we may now make will not be without its reward.

Mr. Helm and I decided, on consultation, that I should write to you, definitely accepting on the part of our mission the offer for an exchange of property; provided, of course, that the offer made by the Chinese should prove bona-fide, and the terms such as would be judged fair and equitable. Having arrived at this decision, we desire, for reasons that will no doubt readily occur to you, that the arrangement which is proposed should be carried out at as early a day as practicable. And as it may serve to expedite matters to let you know at once what terms would seem to us just in the matter, Mr. Helm and I agreed that we should submit to you the following points as constituting a basis for what would be to us a satisfactory arrangement.

They are, in the main, only two: 1. That a piece of land of equal extent with our present property, (seven mow, or about one and one-sixth acres,) situated in a locality that is healthy and suitable for carrying on mission-work, should be made over to our mission by a clear title, officially sanctioned. We would prefer, if the Chinese are willing, to make our own selection among the unoccupied lands that are in the plain; the selection to be approved by them. Of course, any expense incurred in making over the land to us or in the conduct of any part of these negotiations should be borne by the Chinese. 2. That the sum of $10,500 (Mexican) should be given us, to be used in inclosing this land and erecting on it buildings for the mission. It is evident that it would not do for us to leave the erection of these buildings to the Chinese. They are without experience in putting up foreign buildings; and apart from this, the buildings we would wish on the new land would be of a different plan from those we now have. Our present buildings were planned to conform to the narrow plateaux on which they are built, and, of course, the plan would not be the best for a broad and level site. We would expect to be left to plan and build for ourselves. As to the sum mentioned, I may say that Mr. Helm and I made a careful examination to-day of the accounts of the mission, to ascertain the amount that has been actually expended by our mission on the property here. The whole amount expended, as closely as we can estimate, is $10,162, including the cost of the land. The land we now have is more valuable than any we can obtain in exchange, both on account of its favorable situation and also on account of the expensive stone revetments which support the different plateaux. In addition to this the price of building-material, as Mr. Helm informed you, has risen very considerably since our houses were built. And when we consider these circumstances, and also the fact that in the estimate of expenditure we have not reckoned the time and labor spent by Mr. Helm and myself in improving our present property, not to mention the time and labor we must give in carrying out the proposed arrangement, we feel sure that the sum mentioned ($10,500) is the very least we ought to ask in compensation for the property we are called on to give up. Were it merely a question of pecuniary interest, we could not think of accepting such an exchange; but as other considerations indicate plainly the duty of acceding to the propositions of the Chinese, we desire that our negotiations may be conducted with them in all points so as to show them that we aim to be liberal and fair. I might mention that our dwelling-house here, which is set down in the estimate of expenditure at $3,000, was estimated by Mr. Brown, an architect of Shanghai, who visited Hang-chow last year, to be worth $5,000. The Chinese always express surprise when we tell them the actual cost of this house. In conclusion, I would say that Mr. Helm and I desire very much that you will favor us with your presence here when the negotiations take place. And I need not add that, when you come, Mrs. Houston and I will expect the pleasure of entertaining you in our house.

Begging leave to express my appreciation of the very kind spirit you have evinced toward us in this matter, I remain, with much respect, your obedient servant,

M. H. HOUSTON.

E. C. LORD, Esq.,
United States Consul, Ningpo.

[Inclosure 5 in 1 in No. 17.]

Mr. Lord to Rev. M. H. Houston.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Ningpo, September 16, 1873.

SIR: Your communication, dated the 9th instant, has reached me only to-day; though a letter from your colleague, written a day later, reached me two days ago.

I am glad to learn that the view taken of the matter in question, by yourself and colleagues, so entirely agrees with my own. If the Chinese are sincere and earnest in their proceedings, as I think they are, I see no insurmountable obstacle in the way of its accomplishment.

With you, I should like to have the matter arranged as soon as possible. But at this time the examinations are commencing, and during this period the officials at Hang-chow will necessarily be much occupied. So I am at present inclined to wait until the hurry of these is over. Then, should I in the mean time have received sufficient guarantee that my visit at Hang-chow would be likely to be attended with success, I shall endeavor to lose no time in coming up. At present I suppose I have all the guarantee that is absolutely needed; but I wish the matter to be more openly official. And more time will be needed for this.

I have given attention to the statement you have made regarding the kind and amount of indemnity needed. I have, I need hardly say, entire confidence in your wish to deal fairly in the matter, and it will be my aim to secure to you, so far as I am able, everything that shall appear to me just and reasonable. It is not unlikely, however, that I may have some difficulty in accomplishing all that you, or even I, could wish.

That I may have every means to enable me to form an intelligent judgment myself, and also of explaining this judgment, if needs be, to the Chinese, and to our minister at Peking, I shall be glad if you will furnish me with a detailed account of your present grounds, size, original cost, the number and kind of buildings you have put on them, their original cost, the amount you have expended in repairs, the condition the grounds and buildings are now in, the probable difference in the cost of building now and at the time your buildings were erected, &c., &c. In fact, anything relating to past cost and the present value of the premises you now occupy will be acceptable and useful. If anything should occur to change my plan as to the time of my coming up, I will give you the earliest possible notice of it. Very many thanks for your kind offer of hospitality. I should cheerfully avail myself of it unless it should, for reasons of policy, seem desirable that I should stop elsewhere. In that case, my plan is to make my headquarters at the "Keyer House." As I should have much to do with the Chinese, and perhaps with the officials, it might be better for me to be by myself.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD C. LORD,
United States Consul.

REV. M. HALE HOUSTON,
Hang-chow.

[Inclosure 6 in 1 in No. 17.—Translation.]

Koo, intendant of circuit, to Mr. Lord.

Koo, by imperial appointment, intendant of the Ning-shao-tai circuit, makes the following communication:

On the 28th of the seventh month, (September 19,) I received from his excellency Yang, lieutenant-governor, a communication, in which he states that on the 8th of the seventh month, (August 30,) he received a petition from the gentry of Hang-chow, in which the petitioners state:

"Hang-chow is the chief city of the province of Che-Kiang, and the hill in it, called Kwan-me, influences the fung-shuy of the whole city. Hitherto the houses of the people on it have been low and small, and have therefore occasioned no harm.

"But some time ago the people there sold ground to some American missionaries, on which they have erected mission-buildings. This, to be sure, is not forbidden by the treaty; but since these buildings were erected, there have been in the city many disastrous fires, and frequently dangerous diseases. Those skilled in fung-shuy assert that this has been occasioned by these newly-built mission-houses, which, being high and formidable, convert the good influences into those that are bad, and thus occasion much harm. In consequence of this, rumors and complaints have been rife among the people. We, your petitioners, living in the same place with the people, and seeing them in this condition, are not able to be indifferent to it.

"We suppose the object of these missionaries in propagating religion is to exhort men to virtue; but if you want men to be virtuous, you must first secure to them tranquillity. Unless the minds of the people are tranquil, how can they propagate religion? At present the minds of the people are much disturbed, and some method should be at once adopted to quiet them.

"After much and careful consultation, it is our opinion that a piece of ground must be procured elsewhere for the missionaries, and they be persuaded to remove to it. At the same time, the original cost of their land and the expenses occasioned by their removal must be fully refunded to them. And now, this summer, we will go together to Ningpo, and in connection with Ch'an Ching-yoh, of the gentry there, wait upon Mr. Lord, the American consul, and request him to communicate with the missionaries, informing them that this is for the harmony of the people, both Chinese and foreigners. Moreover, to make this exchange would be of no harm to the missionaries, while to the people of Hang-chow the benefit would be great. We trust that the missionaries will cheerfully comply.

"Wherefore, we unitedly pray that you will send a communication to the intendant of circuit, requesting him to communicate with the consul, that he may rightly direct the missionaries. At the same time let a commissioner be sent to Ningpo, who, in connection with Ch'an of the gentry there, may enter into negotiations and arrange for securing another place. And in regard to indemnity, let Mr. Chan, together with the commissioner, make all needful arrangements; so that the matter may be accomplished, the minds of the people tranquilized, and the fung-shuy be entirely protected."

Now, in reference to the foregoing petition, I have to say that I find that it is stipulated in the twelfth article of the treaty that—

"Citizens of the United States residing or sojourning at any of the ports open to foreign commerce, shall be permitted to rent houses and places of business, or hire sites on which they can themselves build houses or hospitals, churches and cemeteries. The parties interested can fix the rent by mutual and equitable agreement; the proprietors shall not demand an exorbitant price, nor shall the local authorities interfere, unless there be some objections offered on the part of the inhabitants of the place. The legal fees to officers for applying their seal shall be paid. The citizens of the United States shall not unreasonably insist on particular spots, but each party conduct with justice and moderation."

According to this language, the treaty does not prohibit foreigners renting lands and building houses. But in this case, as there is objection on the part of the inhabitants, it is feared there would be difficulty in preserving harmony long betwixt the two parties. Now, as the gentry of Hang-chow are willing to indemnify the missionaries for their land, and for the expenses they will incur by their removal, and also to procure for them a piece of unoccupied land elsewhere, on which to build new houses, this seems truly to be for mutual harmony, and in accordance with right principle. So, in compliance with their earnest and urgent request, I think the matter needs immediate attention. Therefore, besides appointing Chu Meu-ts'ing, an expectant district magistrate, to act in concert with Ch'an Ching-yoh in procuring another place, and in arranging the matter of indemnity, I write you, to request that you will at once communicate with the American consul, and ask him to lay this matter before the missionaries, and to use endeavors to induce them to consent to remove, in order to meet the wishes of the people and promote harmony.

Having received the above communication, besides writing to the prefect at Ningpo, asking his co-operation in the matter, I have the honor to address you, and to request that you will, without delay, bring this matter before the missionaries, and use your best endeavors to induce them to remove, in order to meet the wishes of the people and promote harmony. Hoping your immediate attention.

An important communication, addressed to Edward C. Lord, United States consul, Ningpo, in the 12th year of Tungchi, 8th month, and 4th day, (September 25, 1873.)

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Ningpo, September 30, 1873.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's dispatch, dated the 25th instant, informing me that you had received a communication from his excellency Yang, the lieutenant-governor, in which he states, "I have received a petition from the gentry of Hang-chow, to the effect that," &c.; and requesting me, in accordance with the instructions contained in said communication, to bring the matter referred to before the missionaries, and use my endeavors to induce them to consent to remove, in order to meet the wishes of the people and promote harmony.

In reply I have to say that wherever missionaries go, in accordance with the treaty, to propagate religion, their object is to exhort men to do good and to be on terms of amity with both officers and people. Inasmuch as those who give attention to the art of fung-shuy regard the missionary-houses on Kwan-me hill as harmful; and as the gentry are willing to secure for the missionaries residing there another place, and to indemnify them fully for the expenses of their removal, I have deemed it right to address a communication to said missionaries, and to advise them to consent to remove, in compliance with the wishes of the people.

Moreover, as the commissioner, Chu, waited on me on his arrival at Ningpo, I have arranged with him as to the time when I will go to Hang-chow in order to arrange the matter with the missionaries in connection with him and Mr. Chán.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWARD C. LORD,
United States Consul.

His Excellency Koo,
Intendant of Circuit, Ningpo.

Rev. M. H. Houston to Mr. Lord.

SOUTHERN PRESBYTERIAN MISSION,
Hang-chow, October 8, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith the estimate of indemnity to be paid this mission in consideration of its present location on the hill being given up in exchange for another. As I wrote you in my letter of the 2d instant, I was assisted in preparing the estimate by the advice of Mr. Moule and Mr. Lyon, of this city, especially of the former, and you will see that both of these gentlemen indorse the estimate as, in their opinion, just and reasonable. I mentioned to you in my letter that the amount of the estimate, as calculated according to the plan recommended to me by Mr. Moule, really exceeded the amount of the estimate now submitted; but as my colleague and I had at first agreed on the latter amount as being a sufficient indemnity, I thought it best to leave it at this figure. Mr. Moule, who has had more experience in building than any other foreigner in Hang-chow, remarked to me yesterday that he thought the amount mentioned in the estimate was the very least that would be required to put the mission in as good a position as it is now. You may, therefore, regard the estimate which is now submitted as giving the minimum that the mission would consider it just to receive; and if the Chinese are disposed to deal fairly with us, as your letters to us have led us to trust they are, I do not see how they can demur to giving us all that is here claimed.

I inclose herewith the name of a locality where there is a vacant piece of ground, which would suit our purposes. It is on the plain, in a quiet part of the city, and is more than half a mile from the office of the lieutenant-governor, which is the nearest of the government offices. I know of no reason why the Chinese should object to our having this for our new location.

I would ask your attention to the last item of the estimate, that which proposes to include your traveling expenses and your fees. The sum annexed to this item is, I take it, manifestly too small, and I put it in this way that you might change it, and of course with it the amount of the estimate, as may seem to you proper.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. H. HOUSTON,
Southern Presbyterian Mission.

E. C. LORD, Esq.,
United States Consul, Ningpo.

Estimate of indemnity to be paid the Southern Presbyterian Mission in Hang-chow, in the even of its present property on the hill being given up in exchange for another location, on the plain in the city.

Property.	Present value.
I. Eastern compound:
a. Chapel.....	$850
b. Mission-residence, with kitchen and servants' room.....	4,700
c. Girls' school-house and out-houses.....	1,575
d. Wash-house, coal-house, stone gate, &c.....	95
e. Clearing ground and sifting dirt.....	100
f. Wall of inclosure.....	500
g. Stone steps leading to residence.....	14
h. Stone steps leading to school-house, with wall.....	31
i. Capping interior wall.....	15
j. Stone revetment supporting upper plateaux.....	230
k. Masonry originally on premises and still standing.....	275

Property.	Present value.
II. Western compound:
l. Wall of inclosure	$110
m. Clearing ground and sifting dirt	15
n. Boys' school-house and out-houses	1,940
Total present value of property, exclusive of land	10,450
x. To meet fees of consul and expense of moving, (subject to revision by Dr. Lord)	50
Total indemnity in money	10,500

In addition to the money indemnity, seven mow of suitable land to be given the mission on the plain of the city.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE ESTIMATE.

a. The chapel is a brick building 41 feet by 32 feet, erected in 1871. The cost of the materials used in this building, with the Chinese labor employed, was $505. Since the erection of this and the other buildings of the mission, the price of building-materials has, in general, advanced. For bricks, which we bought at $55 per 10,000, we are now asked $62, an advance of 12 per cent. Stone, which we bought at 40 cents per 10 Chinese feet, is now 60 cents per 10 Chinese feet, an advance of 50 per cent. Tiles, for which we paid $18 per 10,000, now sell at $21, an advance of 16 per cent. Plank, which we bought at $1.05 per 10 Chinese feet, has risen to $1.20 per 10 Chinese feet, an advance of 14 per cent. Timber, for joists, which we bought at taels 0.032 per square foot, is now selling at taels 0.045 per square foot, an advance of 14 per cent. Other materials are about as when we bought.

b. This dwelling-house, built in 1871, is a two-story brick building with a verandah extending along the western and southern sides, and a portico over the main door on the north. It contains eight rooms of uniform dimensions, viz, 18 feet by 16 feet by 12 feet, with halls 8 feet wide above and below stairs; attached to the house is a two-story brick building, lower than the dwelling, in which are the kitchen, servants' room, store-room, &c. The materials and Chinese labor used in constructing this house cost $3,000. It was inspected soon after it was built by Mr. Brown, architect, of Shanghai, who estimated its value at $5,000.

c. This school-house is a one-story brick building, erected in 1870, 69 feet by 32 feet in dimensions. It contains 8 rooms of varying sizes and a hall. Attached to it is a brick building used as a kitchen and dining-room. Of the cost of the materials of this building, which was not erected by the present members of the mission, we have no account.

d. The cost of material and Chinese labor in these improvements was about $90.

e. The actual cost of these improvements was about $100.

f. The actual cost of wall of inclosure was $500.

g and h. The money expended in these improvements, was, respectively, $12 and $29.

i. The money expended on this wall was $15.

j. The money spent on this revetment was about $200.

k. The estimated value of two stone revetments, one 206 feet long and averaging 7 feet in height; the other, 30 feet long and 5 feet in height.

l. The cost of materials and Chinese labor on this wall was $100.

m. Fifteen dollars was the sum paid for this improvement.

n. The boys' school-house, erected in 1872, is a two-story brick building, 44 feet in length by 30 feet in breadth. Outside of this is a verandah extending along the eastern and southern sides. The out-houses include a kitchen, wash-house, &c. The cost of materials and Chinese labor on this house was $1,422.

x. Of this sum $25 was intended to cover the expense of moving to the new location. The balance is submitted to the consul, to increase as he may judge proper.

The above estimate of indemnity submitted on behalf of the Southern Presbyterian Mission is, in my opinion, just and equitable.

M. H. HOUSTON,
Southern Presbyterian Mission of America.

I have examined the above estimate and consider it fair and equitable.

G. E. MOULE,
English Christian Mission Society.

I consider the above a reasonable estimate.

D. N. LYON,
American Presbyterian Mission.

Since the above was written a statement has been received from Mr. R. C. Brown, architect, of Shanghai, giving his opinion of the value of the dwelling-house, (b,) which is inclosed herewith. If this opinion is accepted it is easy to see the above estimate is below rather than above the true mark. Apart from the dwelling the money actually expended by the mission on the land and its improvements is $5,462. This, added to the value of the house, makes $10,462. Add to this the cost of moving, $50, and the increase in the cost of building-materials since Mr. Brown saw the house, viz, 15 per cent. of $5,400 = $810, ($5,400 being the cost of the materials used on the premises,) and we have an aggregate of $11,322. Now, deduct from this the value of seven mow of land on the plain, say $322. Mr. Moule bought between six and seven mow of good land on the plain for less than $300, and was told by the official that he had paid double the true price for such land. Reckoning, therefore, $322 a good price for seven mow, we have a balance of $11,000 as the money indemnity. And this, it must be noted, without giving anything like a true compensation for the labor and time of the foreigners who have superintended the purchase of the land, and the erection of the various improvements.

M. H. HOUSTON.

Copy of Mr. Brown's letter referred to above :

Mr. Brown to Mr. Du Bose.

SHANGHAI, October 3, 1873.

MY DEAR MR. DU BOSE: In answer to Mr. Houston's inquiries respecting what I consider the value of his Hang-chow premises, as I saw them in 1871, I should say, for dwelling-house and servants' houses attached, $5,000; and for the boundary-wall and small buildings, about $500.

Of course I was only a few hours at the place, and did not make any memorandum for this estimate, which, however, I think a fair one as I recollect the premises. An architect would supply plans and details for perhaps 4 per cent., the regular charge being 5 per cent., which includes inspection, and that he could not give, except at great expense of time and traveling; but plans sufficiently clear for any one to work would be given for 4 per cent., I should say. The cost of Oregon pine, per superficial foot, 1 inch thick, is about tael cents $4\frac{1}{2}$ per foot; Japan, about $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents. Foochow and Hankow poles about 18 feet long, by mean diameter of 6 inches, about taels 1.50 apiece. Singapore tongued and grooved flooring $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, on Oregon joists 6 by 3, costs about taels 12 to 13 per 10 feet square.

Yours, truly,

RICH. C. BROWN.

Mr. Lord to Koo, intendant of circuit.

HANG-CHOW, October 28, 1873.

SIR: On the 25th ultimo I had the honor of receiving your excellency's dispatch of that date, informing me that you had received a communication from his excellency Yang, the lieutenant-governor, in which he states: "I have received a petition from the gentry of Hang-chow to the effect that," &c., &c., and requesting me, in accordance with the instructions contained in said communication, to bring the matter referred to before the missionaries, and use my endeavors to induce them to consent to remove, in order to meet the wishes of the people and promote harmony. To this communication I replied at the time.

I have now to inform you that I arrived in this city on the 11th instant, since when I have been daily occupied, in connection with the two missionaries, Messrs. Houston and Helm, and the commissioners, Messrs. Ch'än and Chu, in selecting a building-site for said missionaries. The place we have fixed upon is in the jurisdiction of the Jän-hwo magistrate,* lying in the division called Wei-so, northwest of the T'ien Ham-chow bridge, and measuring about 10 mow, ($1\frac{3}{4}$ English acres,) as measured by an agent sent from the office of the district magistrate, ground that belonged to the people. At the request of the gentry the district magistrate has made out the deed of conveyance, which has been handed to me, and which I have delivered to the missionaries. The title-deeds held by the missionaries to the property on the hill have been given up to the commissioners, to be delivered to the lieutenant-governor. In regard to the indemnity to be paid the missionaries for expenses attending their removal, and cost of rebuilding their houses, although at first, while at Ningpo, I expressed the opinion that it might be \$5,000 or more, yet, since coming to Hang-chow, observing the extent of their buildings and examining the accounts relating to them, I find that their claim amounts to \$11,000. And I have to request that you will communicate this fact to his excellency the lieutenant-governor, with the request that he will direct the gentry to pay into my hands this amount, that I may hand it over to the missionaries, that they may be enabled at once to commence erecting their buildings.

* Jän-hwo is one of the two districts into which the city and environs of Hang-chow are divided.

As soon as the missionaries are able to remove from their present position on the hill I will inform you, that directions may be given to the commissioners to receive and take charge of the buildings and appurtenances thereto.

Respectfully requesting your attention to the contents of this letter, and the communication of the same to his excellency the lieutenant-governor, I have the honor, &c., &c.,

EDWARD C. LORD,
United States Consul.

His Excellency Koo,
Intendant of Circuit, Ningpo.

Petition of the Hang-chow gentry, addressed to the prefect.

Petitioners respectfully state that the Kwan-me hill, in the city of Hang-chow, is regarded as affecting the fung-shuy of the entire city. Some time since, the American missionaries erected some mission-buildings there, which the experts in fung-shuy say, being high and formidable, have converted the good influences into those that are bad, causing the minds of the people to be disturbed. Petitioners having consulted together, agreed that they would procure another place for the missionaries, and endeavor to persuade them to remove to it. At the same time they would indemnify them for all the expenses of their removal. They then petitioned the lieutenant-governor to address a communication to the intendant of circuit of Ningpo, requesting him to communicate with Mr. Lord, the American consul there, asking him to co-operate with the commissioners, Messrs. Chu and Ch'ân, in arranging matters with the missionaries. The missionaries, comprehending fully the great principle involved, have signified their willingness to remove, and a piece of ground has been selected within the jurisdiction of the Jan-hwo magistrate, in the Wei-so division, and near the T'ien Ham-chow bridge. An agent has been sent from the office of the district magistrate to take its measurement, and purchase it from its owners. A title-deed has also been issued and conveyed to the missionaries, that they may erect buildings thereon.

Inasmuch as the Kwan-me hill is connected with the fung-shuy of the whole city, the matter is one of great importance.

Now, this matter has been effected by friendly negotiation, and the missionaries have consented to remove, from a desire to promote harmony. As they are about to commence erecting their houses, lest people in the neighborhood should not fully understand the matter, petitioners pray that you will issue a proclamation informing them. This will be really meritorious.

Dated the 12th year of T'ung Chi, 9th month.

[Inclosure 13 in 1 in No. 17.]

Mr. Lord to Rev. M. H. Houston.

HANG-CHOW, October 28, 1873.

DEAR SIR: Your communication, dated the 8th instant, accompanying your "Estimate of indemnity to be paid the Southern Presbyterian Mission in Hang-chow in the event of its present property on the hill being given up in exchange for another location, on the plain, in the city," reached me on my arrival in this city four days later.

I took the earliest opportunity to examine said estimate, and to lay the result before the commissioners appointed by the lieutenant-governor to arrange these matters with me. The request that I made of them was that they should select and secure to you a lot of land on the plain as large as the aggregate of those you now occupy on the hill, and situated so as to suit your convenience; and, in addition, to pay you for the expenses and trouble likely to be incurred in making the exchange desired a money indemnity, amounting to $11,000. This claim was not objected to as unfair; but a good deal of time and labor have been required in selecting and securing the ground, and in completing the arrangements. But I have at last the pleasure of informing you that the matters are all adjusted.

I hand you herewith a title, under the seal of the district magistrate, for the ground in question. And the money, I am authorized to say, will be paid at such times as will, I suppose, suit your convenience, viz: $5,000 on the 10th day of the present Chinese month; $4,000 on the 20th day of the first month of the next Chinese year; and $2,000 when you vacate the premises you now occupy, which it is expected you will do as soon as your new buildings can be erected.

Of the $11,000 to be paid to you, $10,450 are intended to cover the claims of your mission; $200 I have deemed it fair to add for personal losses and inconvenience; and $350 is a small commission charged for my services.

I have arranged to have a proclamation issued by the lieutenant-governor, showing that the exchange you have made has not been forced, but voluntary, and as the result of friendly negotiation.

I trust the matter as thus arranged will meet your approbation, and that the result will be to place you and your fellow-missionaries in this city in safer and more friendly relations with the ruling classes of the Chinese.

I am, &c., &c.,

EDWARD C. LORD,
United States Consul.

SOUTHERN PRESBYTERIAN MISSION,
Hang-chow, October 29, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your favor of yesterday, accompanying the title-deed for the land to which it has been agreed this mission shall remove, and informing the mission of the arrangement which has been made for paying the money indemnity of $11,000. I beg to say, on behalf of the mission, that the arrangements which have been made for us in the matter are in all respects satisfactory to us; and we are glad to avail ourselves of this occasion to convey to you our appreciation of the judicious and skillful manner in which you have conducted the negotiations relating to our affairs.

I beg to inclose with this a bank-check (Chinese) for $350, the sum mentioned in your letter as the commission for your services. We regard this as a very small charge for the continued attention you have given to a business which, we are aware, has made heavy demands on your time and patience.

You will also please find inclosed another check for $60, which my colleagues here and myself hope you will accept from us, to be used in purchasing some article of silver, according to your taste, to serve as a small token of the personal regard which we entertain for you, and as a memento of the transaction which has just been happily brought to a close.

We would ask you to have engraved on it, if convenient, the following inscription: "Presented to Dr. E. C. Lord, United States consul, by the members of the Southern Presbyterian Mission in Hang-chow, in token of kind services rendered by him to the mission in the year 1873." We regret that our situation renders it impossible for us to attend to this ourselves, but we trust that you will kindly oblige us in carrying out our request when you may find it convenient.

In conclusion, we feel ourselves bound to acknowledge with gratitude the good hand of God which has brought this mission safely and prosperously over the difficulties attending our position in this city, and which now opens to us the prospect of a quiet and, we trust, useful residence here. Recognizing in you the instrument through whom these benefits have been brought to us, I would renew to you, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, the expression of our high esteem, and remain, sir, with much respect,

Your obedient servant,

M. H. HOUSTON,
Southern Presbyterian Mission.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Peking, December 23, 1873.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 40, with its various inclosures, relating to and explaining the various steps taken by you and the American missionaries at Hang-chow, with the native gentry and their rulers, to bring about an amicable settlement of the points of issue connected with the location of the mission premises, and the satisfactory settlement of the case.

Few are the occasions on which it has been so agreeable for me to reply to the report of a consul as to his conduct of a case as the present, and I not only congratulate you on its satisfactory termination, but regard it as proving that the missionaries settled in Hang-chow have won for themselves the good opinion of the gentry in the city and the respect of the rulers. It would not, of course, be wise to infer too much from this incident, as to the feelings of the people of Hang-chow; but the precedent which has been given by them as to the most desirable mode of arranging a question with foreigners, is of itself calculated to promote other like mutual concessions. Your long residence at Ningpo, and freedom in carrying on correspondence and conversation with the officers in their own language, have both peculiarly fitted you for bringing about an equitable settlement; and to your own satisfaction in feeling that all parties are content with the arrangement made, and your efforts in it, which you accept as your chief reward. I beg most cordially to add my approval of what has been done, and shall have pleasure in bringing it to the notice of the State Department. I shall be pleased to have you inform Messrs. Houston and Helm that their readiness to go through the labor of rebuilding the mission premises, in order to remove the irritation of the citizens, and the scrupulous care they have taken in getting the just valuation of their buildings and improvements, are worthy of commendation. I hope they will find increased facilities for their work in the greater favor of the people.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, February 9, 1874. (Received April 28.)

SIR: I have the honor to send for your information the translation of a dispatch received about four months since from Prince Kung, (inclosure 1,) who therein upholds the report of the intendant at Shanghai, protesting against the action of the Great Northern Telegraph Company, whose managers had opened a station at Woosung, and taken up the cable between there and Shanghai. The intendant had applied to the consular body to interfere in the matter, and restrain the telegraph company, whose agents had, without regarding the agreement made between Mr. Wade and the Yamen at Peking, erected their poles between Woosung and Shanghai. The consular body referred his complaint to a committee, whose letter in explanation of the thing, and report of their personal interview with him, are inclosed as the best explanation of Prince Kung's dispatch, (inclosures 2 and 3.)

This was sent as a circular to all the legations, and the general understanding was that the best course was to let it remain unanswered. If a discussion arose, the proceedings at Woosung could not be defended according to the terms of the agreement referred to in it, which had, however, been made with special reference to an English line. Its privileges had been used by the Danish company, which was first in the field. The general terms of this agreement are given in Prince Kung's dispatch and the other inclosures, and confined all telegraphic operations to hulks and submarine cables.

The intendant has taken no steps to remove the poles since the interview described, and the people along the river-bank have now become accustomed to their appearance there and in the settlement. No one has any apprehension, therefore, of a repetition of the acts of 1864, when they were all taken up in a night by the country people, with the connivance of the intendant, because they interfered with and injured the good luck of the region.

Moreover, as a good thing is always its own best argument and vindicator, the native merchants at Shanghai have begun to employ the telegraph to carry on their business with Hong-Kong and Canton and Japan to such a degree that they desire no interruption to the line; and this public opinion has its influence with the intendant. We shall, I think, now that several months have passed, hear no more of the matter.

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

TUNGCHI, 12th year, 8th moon, 19th day, (October 10, 1873.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication:

I received a dispatch on the 2d instant from the superintendent of trade of the southern ports, inclosing the following report to him from Chên, intendant of circuit and collector of customs at Shanghai:

"It has lately come to my knowledge that a foreign telegraph-office has been opened at Woosung, and that telegraph-posts have been erected to connect with the submarine cable laid between Hong-Kong and Shanghai, the end of which has been landed there for that purpose. The treaty makes no mention of the telegraph, and I therefore referred to the dispatch in which the Yamen communicated to the superintendent of trade the agreement they had come to respecting it in June, 1870, with Mr. Wade, the British minister. This was to the effect that the cable was to be a submarine cable, the end of which was to be made fast to a hulk to be moored outside of the foreign anchorage. The opening of a telegraph-office at Wu-sung, and the erection of telegraph-posts for the reception of a cable which has been brought on shore there, being nothing else but a rejection of a water in favor of a land line, and, as such, being distinctly at variance with the agreement providing that the cable should terminate in a hulk to be anchored outside of the port, I immediately wrote to the British consul and requested him to order their removal.

"He replied that the office was the property of the Great Northern Telegraph Company, and that the way to proceed in the matter would be to communicate officially with the board of foreign consuls through Mr. Seward, the United States consul-general, who, from length of residence at Shanghai, was at present the chairman of the board.

"In his reply, Mr. Seward, the United States consul-general, stated that the case against the Great Northern Telegraph Company had been referred by the board of consuls to a committee composed of the British and Danish consuls and himself, and that he would be glad if I would fix upon a day to meet and discuss the case.

"I met the British consul and the United States consul-general by appointment on the 4th September last, and I pointed out to them that, in terms of the rules laid down, the telegraph-office at Woosung must be closed, the line of telegraph-posts removed, and the cable made to terminate in a hulk to be moored outside of the port of Woosung. I further showed that the Great Northern Telegraph Company, in unauthorizedly taking upon themselves to construct a line at Woosung, were acting in direct opposition to the rules agreed upon by Mr. Wade, the British minister, and the foreign office; and I represented that, if the consuls did not prevent their doing so, it was to be feared that other mercantile communities would disobey the instructions issued by their minister resident at Peking in a way calculated to lead to constant breaches of the treaty and its regulations. I added that if the merchants were to be allowed to do as they pleased in such matters, it would be very difficult to conduct international questions between China and foreign powers.

"To this the British consul replied, that as the Danish consul was not present it would be better to postpone for a time further discussion of the case. The United States consul-general, who was present at this interview, did not dissent from this suggestion. But although a considerable time has elapsed since the date of that meeting, not a word further has been heard on the subject; I therefore," adds the superintendent of trade, "now request instructions how to act in the matter."

In regard to the above, the foreign office would observe that no provision was made in the treaty for the construction of lines of telegraph between the treaty ports along the coasts. They therefore must refer to the letter from Mr. Wade, the British minister, in 1870, concerning telegraphy, which he then addressed to the foreign office, in which he referred to a dispatch from Lord Clarendon, the foreign secretary of state, in which he said that the telegraph-offices in England were anxious to ascertain whether they could obtain permission to lay cables between Shanghai and the treaty ports of Canton, Swatow, Amoy, Foo-chow, and Ningpo. They had in all their proposals in doing this, meant a line which could be carried by land from place to place; but that the present arrangement was totally different, as it contemplated laying a submarine cable along the coast, the end of which only was to be landed to connect with a foreign establishment on shore.

In replying to this note of the British minister, I pointed out that the question of introducing telegraphs into China was attended with great difficulties; but stated that no opposition would be offered to the laying of a submarine cable along the coast, provided the end of it was not brought on shore and did not in any way touch ground at the treaty ports. I further observed that it was only by clearly defining the limits within which telegraphic operations in China might be carried on, that one could hope to avoid future complications.

In his rejoinder, the British minister stated that he had signified to the telegraph agent sent out, for the information and guidance of his principals, that the end of the cable must not be brought on shore, and that, to prevent possible complications, it was essential that means should be devised for carrying out the project within the limits imposed.

It follows, therefore, that the Great Northern Telegraph Company, in opening an office at Woosung, and in erecting telegraph-posts, or, in other words, in bringing the cable on shore, and in thus constituting it a land instead of a submarine cable, have acted in direct opposition to the rules laid down in the note of the British minister above quoted; and as the case has been referred to the United States consul-general, the British consul, and the Danish consul, it is requisite that instructions should be sent to these officers to have the proceedings of the telegraph company put a stop to.

In view, therefore, of the report that has been forwarded by the superintendent of trade of the southern ports, it is my duty to request that your excellency will direct the consul-general that by the agreement of 1870, the telegraph-posts and telegraph-office belonging to the said company must be at once removed from the places in which they are now standing.

Report of committee in the Great Northern Telegraph Company matter.

SHANGHAI, September 10, 1873.

In pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of the consular body held at the United States consulate-general on the 27th of August, 1873, to the effect that Messrs. Seward, Johnson and Medhurst should seek an interview with the Taotai for the purpose of ascertaining his actual views in respect to the telegraphic communication lately opened between Woosung and Shanghai, Messrs. Seward and Medhurst called upon the Taotai on the 4th of September, 1873.

The Taotai was attended by Chän, the mixed-court magistrate, who took an active part in the conversation.

Messrs. Seward and Medhurst directed their efforts toward discovering how far the objections raised by the Taotai in his official letter were positive as against the institution of telegraphs generally, or were only officially put forward with the object of setting himself right with his superiors in respect to the particular line objected to.

The Taotai disclaimed any desire to oppose telegraphy in general. He referred to the so-called agreement with Mr. Wade, and declared it to be the sole ground of his objection. He was bound, he said, in duty, as well as for his own sake, to see that the understanding come to by the Tsung-li Yamun was strictly acted upon; and if the consuls could only arrange so that the views of the telegraphic company were carried out in accordance therewith, he would be satisfied. He was even prepared, he said, to stretch a point, if the consuls would on their part defer to his objection.

He admitted the existence of other lines in the settlements, but he argued that these did not afford any precedents, seeing that they were within the boundaries allotted to foreigners, and had not been made the subject of agreement. It was urged that the line objected to was upon property owned by foreigners, and in no way prejudiced any rights, private or public. But he could or would not see how this affected the question; an understanding had been come to, and it could not be departed from by the one side without the consent of the other. It was then suggested that, as he had performed his duty by protesting, he might rest satisfied with the mere protest; but this he declined to admit. His duty, he pleaded, extended to seeing that his protest was effectual, otherwise he could not set himself right with his superiors. It was then argued that the understanding, if any, had long ago been broken through by previous Taotais; for, as a matter of fact, the line had been landed from the very first, and run into the company's premises, in Nanking road. The breach of agreement having thus been condoned, it was too late now to raise objections. To this he replied, that any failure of duty on the part of his predecessors could afford no excuse for his following in their footsteps. The vast utility of telegraphy, as an institution, was also enlarged upon, but without effect; the Taotai entirely admitting its benefits to the public at large, but reverting to the necessity of keeping faith in the matter of the particular agreement entered into by the Tsung-li Yamun.

On the whole, Messrs. Seward and Medhurst were compelled to come to the conclusion that the Taotai had no personal objection to the innovations which have been ventured upon by the Great Northern Telegraph Company, but that he had been driven by the public attention which had been unfortunately drawn to the line to enter his protest against it. That to this protest the Taotai is likely to adhere pertinaciously, and that it can only be met by the consuls with an explanation, so prepared as to free the Taotai from responsibility, while it carries conviction to the superior authorities, to whom he is responsible.

With this impression the consuls for the United States, Denmark, and Great Britain have drafted a dispatch, which they propose should be addressed to the Taotai, in reply to his communication, and they recommend it for the adoption of their colleagues.

Mr. Seward to the Taotai.

SHANGHAI, September 30, 1873.

SIR: I have had the honor, as senior consul, to receive your communication, dated the 19th of August last, in which you call attention to the fact that the Great Northern Telegraph Company have recently established a station at Woosung, and have carried a wire along the line of new road, between that place and Shanghai, and request the consuls to require the immediate removal of both station and wire, on the ground that the extension of the telegraph to Shanghai was permitted on the express understanding that the end should not be landed anywhere upon the shore.

I have placed this letter before the consuls, and have now to communicate to you their response.

The company alluded to is Danish. Its lines connect with the Russian telegraph, and in this way that government is interested.

As a consequence, the matter is one which more directly concerns the Danish and Russian consuls; and if your protest is to be further urged, it would with more propriety be addressed to them.

As, however, the general question of telegraphic communication intimately concerns the entire commercial interests of the port, the consuls have given the subject their most careful consideration, and, on their behalf, I am to state the opinion that you are attaching great importance to a very simple proceeding, which in no way injuriously affects the public welfare, and to request your attention to the following considerations:

The new road between the anchorage and Shanghai (which, after all, is only 12 miles long) is the property of foreigners, who have acquired the land in the usual manner, and subscribed funds for its construction, their object being to secure quick communication between Shanghai and the shipping at Woosung.

The manager of the telegraph company, finding that the cable which had been laid along the river's bed between Woosung and Shanghai was often broken in consequence of fouling the anchors of the numerous vessels which frequent the stream, applied to the road proprietors for permission to take the wires along the road. Their consent was obtained, and the new line formed. The posts are placed wholly on foreign-owned lands, and, therefore, in no way interfere with the rights of the Chinese government or of the people; and the convenience of the company and of the business of the port has been materially benefited.

I am authorized to say further, that it is by no means foreigners alone who have derived advantages from the lines of the Great Northern Telegraph Company. Chinese merchants employ them very extensively, and the supreme and provincial governments have had occasion to invoke their valuable aid.

The consuls believe, indeed, that the telegraph is an appliance, the utility of which cannot be overrated, and against which no arguments worthy of consideration can be adduced; and they have no doubt that in view of the whole case you will accept this explanation and refrain from pressing the matter.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, February 12, 1874. (Received April 28.)

SIR: The reduction of the last stronghold of the Mohammedan rebels, which have controlled the northwestern provinces of Shensi and Kansuh more than ten years, is an event of so much importance here that I have obtained a translation of the official report of Tso Tsung-tang and Kinshun, the governor-general and commander-in-chief of those provinces, which I now inclose (inclosure 1) for your perusal. The city of Suh Chan lies very near the extreme western gate of the great wall, in the province of Kansuh, about eighteen hundred miles from Peking, and controls the travel through that gate into the regions across the desert to Hami. Owing to its distance from the thickly-settled parts of the province, and its proximity to the Mohammedan tribes, the difficulty of reaching it with an army well provisioned and armed has heretofore baffled all the efforts of the imperialists, and it resisted long after their forces had taken other cities held by the rebels. A glance at a map of China will show you that Suh-Chan is likely hereafter to become the key to the possession of much of that part of Central Asia lying north of Thibet, as it now is to this government of those regions still under its sway.

The merciless nature of Chinese warfare is shown in this memorial, and the rancor of war was aggravated in this rebellion by the bitterness of religious bigotry, in which the Mohammedans excelled. There is no reason for doubting the statements here given, and as the rebels had themselves given no quarter, I suppose they expected none.

The insurrection thus ended has left large portions of these two provinces nearly depopulated, and years must elapse before they can recover from the desolations of war. In cases where these rebels, who are said to be all pure Chinese and not Turks, met bodies of native Catholics in their progress, they are reported to have always spared their lives if not found in arms.

The capture of Suh Chan brings to an end all organized rebellion within the borders of China proper, or the eighteen provinces. It began in 1848 in the towns lying west of Canton City, and through the mismanagement of the provincial authorities its leaders waxed stronger and more desperate, and under the name of Taipings (great peace) nearly succeeded in dismembering the empire. They were finally subdued in 1865, after the capture of Nanking.

The Mohammedans rose in array in the southwest and northwest, where they set the imperialists at defiance for ten years or more, but are now no longer formidable, and the few chiefs who may have escaped with a small following will not be able to gather head in those devastated districts.

The manner in which orderly government, trade, and rebuilding of ruined towns has revived in those departments in the valley of the Yangtse, which were left almost like a wilderness in 1855, leads one to hope for a similar reviving in the western provinces.

CAPTURE OF SUH-CHAN IN KANSUH.

Tso Tsung-tang, imperial commissioner and governor-general of Shensi and Kansuh, created earl of the first class, with Kinshun, former commander in chief at Uliasutai, kneeling, implore the sacred glance upon this memorial, reverently prepared and forwarded by special courier, reporting the reduction of the city of Suh-Chan, the restoration of perfect quiet by the destruction of the Mohammedan rebels, both resident and stranger, with their chief and leaders, and the measures taken for restoring order.

Your servant Tso Tsung-tang has already reported the movements of the imperial forces from August 23 to September 18, 1873, at which date they had invested and laid siege to Suh-Chan, gaining frequent advantages, and reported his own arrival before Suh-Chan October 3.

I then established my headquarters two-thirds of a mile south of the city, and next day I made the circuit of the investing lines to take a general survey. The encampments of our several commands encompassed the city, completely investing it, but, the besieging force being weaker and more scattered outside the northwest and south gates, the Chinsi and Fuchung battalions, brought up by me, were ordered to occupy those positions.

The commanders all agreed that this opportunity ought to be improved to storm and raze the place and thereby end [the rebellion.]

We ourselves judged that the mine prepared by Kinshun at the northeast angle would be ready for explosion simultaneously with the general assault; and detached Sung-Ching to join the assault there, while Tso Tsung-tang, at a spot where the wall at the southwest angle had crumbled under our shells, directed Sü and Yang to choose a picked force and fill up the ditch, so as to scale the wall over the rubbish, at the same time drawing up the entire force, lest the rebels should cut their way through by a sudden sally.

Ma-sz, the Mohammedan rebel chief, seeing from the wall that I was making final dispositions to attack him, was greatly alarmed; and on the 4th October sent out a petition by a messenger to Sü, in the Kwei-hwa division, praying that he might be protected and given permission to go out beyond the extreme western pass of the Great Wall to induce the rebels there to submit and be forgiven. We, knowing his treachery, did not grant this, but returned his petition with the indorsement requiring him to issue a proclamation notifying the old and young, matron and maiden, who would save their lives, and sincerely wished protection to come to the camp for examination and such disposition as we saw fit. This answer to Ma-sz was not followed by any proclamation on his part.

October 7, at 1 o'clock a. m., Sü and Yang took command of their troops and filled up the ditch, during which the report of the cannon and small-arms firing on them from the wall was incessant. Brigadier Laichang and others steadily returned their fire from breech-loading pieces, and destroyed not a few of the enemy. At 5 o'clock, the ditch being filled, the assault was made. Yang, taking command of his troops, advanced gallantly, and reached the breast of the wall; but the rebels, taking advantage of their higher standing-ground, fought desperately, the bullets and blocks of stone raining down in showers, so that our troops could not gain the top of the wall.

At day-break the mine under the northeast angle was sprung, and Lieutenant-Colonel Changlin bravely led the charge with a picked force, breasted spears and stones, and stormed the wall. The rebels in a compact force fought to the death. Changlin, after receiving several deep spear-wounds, fought on, covered with blood, till he was struck by a bullet and killed.

The next day (October 8) Sü and Yang each mined the southwestern wall, Brigadier Laichang and his captains maintaining a steady fire from breech-loading pieces upon the masses of rebels, while your servant Kinshun, with Sung-Ching, attacked with foreign siege-guns the northeast curtain, and Tso Tsung-tang gave orders to get a heavy gun into battery at the northeast angle to fire night and day. Each of these officers destroyed great numbers of the rebels.

At 5 a. m., on the 12th October, the mines prepared by Sü and Yang, respectively, being completed, were fired simultaneously, and Yang, with a body of veterans picked from the several commands, led the charge, supported by a brigadier, leading the Fuchung battalion. They assaulted repeatedly and destroyed great numbers of the rebels, but the latter had opened a deep trench obliquely across the terreplein, planting the outside with spears cheveaux-de-frise, and crouched behind it waiting till our troops scaled the wall, when they met us with continued volleys. Upon our forces receiving this slight check, Yang bravely seized a sword, put himself at the head of his men, and had gained the terreplein, when a bullet pierced him to the brain. The soldiers bore him back to camp, and he died the next day. Sü, seeing Yang severely wounded, bravely led the columns again to the attack, but only to meet a fresh loss of over 2,000 men killed, besides more than 500 of the gun-train wounded. Such are the facts regarding our attacks upon Suh Chan from the 6th to 11th of October.

Both of us were of opinion that as the rebels had but this single city left them, all succor cut off, and their provisions exhausted, they could not possibly escape extermination. We, therefore, judged that rather than imperil our good troops in fruitless assaults, it was better to run fresh parallels, shell the wall with breech-loading guns, while our men mined the wall in fresh places, and thus reduce the city.

At this juncture Lin Kin-tang reported for service at Kau-chan, and I [Tso Tsung-tang] ordered him up with several battalions to aid in the final conquest, informing him that the resubjugated Mohammedans, originally belonging to this very body of rebels, and now enrolled in his Futing battalion, could be used to great advantage.

On the 24th of October your servant Kinshun detailed from his force a body of veterans, who stormed a breach in the northeast wall and threw up barricades across the terreplein, thus cutting off the passage of the rebels back and forth upon the wall. The fearless enemy for days bravely attempted its recapture, but were always repulsed with great slaughter by our foreign fire-arms and heavy guns. From the south and west gates of the town the old and young, both Chinese and Mohammedan, flocked out to our camps, begging for their lives. They were examined in detail by your servant Tso Tsung-tang, and I learned that provisions in the city were exhausted, the rebels slaughtering their horses and asses to appease their hunger, while the old folk and children begged the skins to cook, and thereby keep body and soul together. Unknown numbers had perished from starvation. These had heard that the imperialists did not slay children, females, or aged, and had therefore stolen out of the city to save their lives. I thereupon established a bureau near the river-bank to take charge of and support them while awaiting final disposition.

Lin Chin-tang arrived on the 30th with five battalions of the contingent from the province of Hunan, and the resubjugated Mohammedans, and I ordered him to encamp outside the south gate. Several Mohammedan officers daily galloped their horses past the city wall, shouting to Ma-sz and the other rebels "Your time is come; look well to yourselves!" Ma-sz himself knew that his escape was cut off, and implored that he might come out of the city and return to his allegiance.

On November 4 he came in person to my headquarters, and, with his head in the dust, prayed for his life. Kinshun and the other generals had seats on the dais at the time. We told him that his crimes were now past pardon, and that he would have done better to follow our previous instructions. He was told first to deliver up his arms and horses, and afterward make a complete muster-roll of the local and enlisted Mohammedans, all of whom were to await trial and further disposition. We further ordered him to lead the Mohammedan chiefs in companies to the camp to wait our commands. Ma-sz assented and subsequently surrendered 1,170 halberds, poleaxes, cannon, and gingals, in all numbering several hundreds, with over a thousand spears and swords, and tridents without number. There were only 70 cavalry-horses; as he said that, being for days in extreme hunger, they had killed and eaten the lean and starving, and only these remained.

We had the enlisted Mohammedans produce separate muster-rolls, specifying their nativity; the natives of Kanchan were to leave by the east gate and be mustered by Sung-ching; those from beyond the Great Wall and Shachan were to be mustered by Kinshun; and the natives of Sining, Hochan Siünhwa, and Shensi province were to come out by the south gate, and be mustered by Lin and Sü, whose men were to separate the males and females, and place them in the abandoned batteries adjacent. In the night of November 10th the Mohammedan leader Chin, with some scores of rebels, stole out of the great north gate, but I (Kinshun) attacked him with my troops and cut them to pieces; Chin being decapitated upon the spot.

The mustering was completed on the 11th, and on completing the rolls, the number seeming very large, there were struck off the names of 1,100 native Chinese, male and female. At 3 o'clock p. m. the next day, I (Tso Tsung-tang) ordered the nine chief criminals to be brought out with Ma-sz, and, after their crimes had been proclaimed, they were cut to pieces. At the third report of the signal-gun from headquarters all the 1,573 enlisted Mohammedans, the ruthless originators of these calamities, were successfully decollated in rows under our inspection.

The same night the several corps entered the city and set it on fire; bullets and spears did their work, till the whole local Mohammedan population, numbering more than 5,400, save about 900 females, children, and old-folk, were given to the flames; and peace reigned in Suh-Chan.

On the 13th, Shi, the intendant of the Ngansi-Suh-Chan circuit, with Li, the acting prefect of Suh-Chan, made their entry into the city. Everywhere were corpses and skeletons, those of infant and aged pillowed and heaped on each other; the maiden and the wife had far from escaped violation, while in the confusion of the night sword crossing sword had not distinguished friend from foe.

Ten years have elapsed since the Mohammedan rebels usurped possession of Suh-Chan. The trouble was at first a feud between the inhabitants and the native Mohammedans.

Afterward two of them, Ma and Lan, received so-called investiture as high chiefs from To Teh-lin, their leader, and the flames of devastation spread yet wider. After Lan's death, Ma, with a band of Sining hunters as a nucleus, banded together the Sola Mohammedan tribe, with the desperadoes from Sining and Hochan, and seized this city, as a place where his communications would be open both within and without the Great Wall to the western gates. To-wei on the western road, with Ma Hing-yuan and Pen-yuan on the central road, and on the eastern road Ma Hwa-shing, all helped him to keep up his connections in the center. On the occasion of his return to allegiance, and receiving a Chinese command, he changed his name to Ma Chung-liang, but his real name was Ma Wän-lu, while he went familiarly by the name of Ma-sz. At the date of that submission there were still in Suh-Chan 30,000 Chinese not Mohammedans. The able-bodied of these were cruelly slaughtered by this rebel chief, and their wives and daughters insulted or enslaved. There remain at present, male and female, only some 1,100 aged and decrepit. The enlisted Mohammedans, who adhered to him from beyond the Great Wall in Sha-Chan and Hami, included the red-turbaned aborigines, and inside the Great Wall those of Sining, Hochan, and elsewhere with the roving Mohammedans of Shensi, the whole aggregating some 20,000, of whom half were fighting men. The Chinese force daily grew weaker, and the Mohammedan bands constantly gathered head, till it appeared as if the rising would end by our finally losing the whole region.

General Sii commenced their extirpation in 1871 with his army, fighting his way forward through Kanchan and Koatai, with scores of battles of greater or less magnitude, till he drove them together into this one city. Your servant Kinshun came to his assistance and completed the investment. The blockade became still closer upon the arrival of Sung Ching's force. With the fall of the Tung Kwan their supplies were gone, while with the retirement of those rebels operating beyond the western pass in the Wall assistance from without was cut off, yet they still had the hardihood to cling obstinately to this last point, swearing to the last to fight to the death. This illustrates their life-long tactics, their independent and untamable disposition, different, indeed, from those of other rebels.

Happily Your Majesty's far-reaching combinations have now caught them in their meshes, and rebels who for years have escaped the ax have now been executed, as their muster-roll was called, like sheep or pigs in their pens, not one escaping. The merits of the several hosts of our army are so great that it is almost needless for your servants to pray your sacred bounty to bestow liberal promotion and distinction.

Your servants now respectfully present their joint memorial and forward it by special courier to report the resubjugation of Suh-Chan, the execution of the execrable prisoners, and the complete pacification of those parts of Kansuh lying within the Great Wall, and humbly pray that Your Majesty, having cast your sacred glance thereon, will issue instructions as to the further action to be taken.—Peking Gazette, December 28, 1873.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, March 30, 1874. (Received May 26.)

SIR: A Roman Catholic bishop, whose diocese comprises a part of Manchuria and the region contiguous to Corea, has lately reached Peking from Newchwang, and brings an account of an entire change in the government of Corea within the last three months, and the removal of the ruler who has usurped the chief authority during the past fifteen years. The principal facts, as he reports them, tally very well with some statements made years ago, and bear the appearance of authenticity, though many details yet remain to be supplied.

It is known that about fifteen years ago the succession of the reigning house of Ti to the throne of Corea became extinct, and the government came into the hands of the Queen Dowager. She sought out a remote scion of the house of Ti, and adopted a lad of eight years old as the heir-apparent, whose own father and grandfather were still living. This boy's father managed by force and fraud, ere long, to engross the entire authority; and his son and the Queen Dowager became mere ciphers in his hands. It would seem that, stimulated by a feeling of insecurity in his seat, he began to oppress the people and remove his enemies. He took umbrage against everything foreign, especially foreign books and teachings, and the extension of foreign trade. In 1864 he exercised greater severity, and, as is well known, about that time began a deadly persecution against the Roman Catholics, putting to death hundreds and hundreds of native converts, and killing eleven foreign priests. The proceedings of Admiral Rose, in 1866, not being followed up by any ulterior measures on the part of the French, he took courage, having, as he supposed, repelled both the Russian and French ships. It appears that a Russian man-of-war had come on the eastern coast of Corea in 1864, which remained there a long time for the purpose of opening negotiations in respect to the new frontier between the two countries of Russia and Corea, near Port May and Possiet, but her mission was unsuccessful.

The result of the visits of American men-of-war, in consequence of the destruction of the "General Sherman," and especially of the United States expedition in 1871, were all regarded as a great triumph, by this usurper, who had, as he supposed, delivered the kingdom from subjugation by foreigners, and asserted the prowess of his army. But after the American flag had retired from his coasts, and there was time to review the whole affair, the more sensible part of the rulers began to see it in a different light. The members of the annual embassy had also had an opportunity to confer with the Chinese rulers at Peking, and learn from them all the real nature of Mr. Low's attempt to open amicable relations with their sovereign. At any rate we know that some of the Coreans in this city last year purchased many copies of all the books about foreign countries, including the monthly magazine published in this city, to carry back with them.

The conclusion now reported is, that the legitimate king and his adopted mother in conjunction with the ruling nobles of Corea, have compelled the usurper Ti to retire, and have assumed control. The change has been brought about without bloodshed, and the bishop (Monsignor R.) looks forward to a peaceable state of their missions, seeing that the new authorities are favorably disposed toward foreigners and Christianity.

He reports that the disastrous and bloody result to the Coreans of our attack on Fort McKee was used as a strong argument with Ti, of the uselessness of his resisting foreign nations, whose weapons and tactics were so superior to theirs, and their resources so great. On all these points there is much, no doubt, to be learned, but there seem to be full grounds for believing the report of an entire change of government in that kingdom.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, May 29, 1874. (Received July 18.)

SIR: In Mr. Low's dispatch, No. 221, of 10th January, 1873, he sets forth the disadvantages and complications likely to arise from permitting citizens of the United States to enter the military and diplomatic service of Japan; and in your reply of 3d April, you state that the Department has no authority, by law, to prevent them from entering the service of a foreign power. Referring to these two letters, I have now to relate the particulars of a conversation which took place at the interview referred to in my last, which bear upon this point.

With curious inconsistency, the Chinese officials brought forward the employment of American officers and ships by the Japanese in their descent upon Formosa, as a violation of the spirit of Article I of the treaty of Tien-tsin, when they had not themselves deemed that act to amount to a declaration of war. How can the United States permit her citizens to help and direct Japanese troops, they asked, when this article provides that if another nation acts unjustly or oppressively toward China, she will try to bring about an amicable arrangement between them? Even if it was not so stated in the article, this permission, in their view, involved a complicity in those acts of injustice or oppression which its spirit was intended to adjust, if not restrain. To this I replied, that it was fairly implied in the spirit of the article that the United States must be the judge, in a measure, of the nature of those acts here called unjust or oppressive; it was never designed that she should interfere until she knew the facts and reasons for them, and could do so intelligently. The wording of the article involved a full hearing of the matter at issue; and it was hardly applicable in the present instance, as they admitted that they had received nothing from the Japanese government in explanation of their intentions. I then inquired if Soye-shima had not discussed the matter with them when he was in Peking last year? They answered that he had said nothing to them about his government sending a force to occupy any part of Formosa, and they would not admit that he had discussed the question of the wrongs suffered by Japanese subjects at the hands of the savages there. But it is generally known that there was considerable talk upon these points at that time, and Mr. Low's dispatch (No. 264) of June 13th conveys the impression that the Japanese ambassador had then stated his grievance, and the redress he proposed to take if the Chinese refused to do anything.

They then inquired if, in the event of hostilities arising between China and Japan, Americans who were engaged in the ranks of the enemy should be killed by Chinese troops, what notice would be taken of it by their own Government?

I answered that all Americans who entered the military service of the Japanese did so at their own risk, and that the American Government would take no notice of their death under such circumstances; all persons composing a hostile force could only be regarded as enemies by China.

They did not pursue their inquiries in this direction. * * * I referred them to the translation of Wheaton's work for an authoritative explanation upon the usages in such cases in western lands; but both of us felt, no doubt, that those usages are much modified by the principle of extraterritoriality found in our treaties, particularly in military operations.

The employment of our citizens in peaceful pursuits, or even to aid in the suppression of a rising of their own subjects, was referred to by them as of a different character from the same persons engaging in active hostilities against them on behalf of Japan; and they would have admitted the same principle when applied to their employing foreigners against Japan. Their objection showed that they had thought over this point; and it has its force; but there was no discussion, and it was evident that they had no wish to pursue it.

I have nothing to add to the remarks of Mr. Low in the dispatch above cited, which can strengthen them. This principle of self-government to foreigners was granted by the Chinese in the face of an overpowering force, and when they had had no practical experience, almost, of its nature and results. During the Taiping rebellion, all foreigners who aided the rebels took their own risks, and made very little noise about their doings. When Burgevine was captured in 1865, the fact that he had once been a trusted officer in the service of the imperialists, and had left them to join the rebels, led me to allow him to remain a prisoner until instructions were received. Mr. Seward replied, that upon a just conviction, he might be left in the hands of the Chinese, adding, "but this is to be understood to rest upon our own consent, upon the grounds of national honor, and not from Chinese right under treaty stipulations." (See my dispatch No. 3, and Mr. Seward's No. 7, of 6th November, 1865.)

I infer that the implied freedom of action to Americans to enter the military service of other nations, in that there is no law to prevent them, had primary reference to service in Christian nations, and when thus employed by those nations, allegiance to their own ceases. But does not this doctrine of ex-territoriality materially alter the nature of this service? There is no provision that I know of contemplating the naturalization of an American citizen in Japan or China; and it is understood here that foreigners in these countries cannot change their national character, and claim the protection of another country.

If an American citizen enters the military service of the Japanese, and another enters the same service in China, it is to be supposed that the rulers of both countries engaged these men to help them fight, if necessity required; but if they are to be led against nations with whom the United States are at peace, they are bound to refuse to serve, and to leave the flag thus employed. But supposing they refuse to desert it, and they appear in arms against each other, one under the Chinese and one under the Japanese flag, we have the spectacle of our countrymen fighting on behalf of two non-Christian governments, each side claiming the protection of its own country against the wrong-doing of its employers while trying to do all the harm they can to the opposing nation. It appears to me that this is not at all unlikely to take place within a few months, if the Japanese pursue their aggressive policy in Formosa.

Mr. McLane's decree of December 5, 1854, making it a misdemeanor to fight for or against the Emperor of China within his dominions in case of rebellion, is still in force; but I do not know whether a similar one has been issued in Japan. This decree was effectual in restraining an attempt made about the time of its publication to aid the Canton government to destroy banditti near that city; but no conviction was ever made under it during the Taiping rebellion. I think, however, it had no little moral effect in deterring many from joining the imperialists, though after Ward's force became famous, and he was killed, Mr. Burlingame applied to have Burgevine put in command of the force, thus neutralizing the decree in effect.

The British government requires that previous permission be obtained before its subjects can enter the Emperor's military service.

It is very desirable, if Mr. McLane's decree conflicts with the implied liberty to our countrymen of entering the military service of the Japanese or Chinese, which the absence of an actual prohibition seems to involve, that instructions be given in time. At present it seems to do so.

Your dispatch of April 3, 1873, refers to General Le Gendre alone, who is not now in the employ of the United States, and was free to accept the offer made to him. This I told the Chinese officials, when they complained that American officers were employed against them; but in respect to Lieutenant-Commander Douglass Cassell and Major Wasson, who, I believe, are still in our Navy and Army, I answered them verbally, that as yet there were no hostilities existing, and consequently these officers were not doing anything at which China could complain.

It is highly probable that, if the Japanese carry out their designs upon Formosa and Corea, as shadowed forth in Mr. De Long's dispatches Nos. 302 and 309, active hostilities will arise in this part of Asia, which will almost certainly involve us in their issues and conduct. I may be pardoned, therefore, for bringing this question of employing our countrymen on either side to your notice, after what Mr. Low has written.

International law, which is applicable to western nations in times of war, has not been well defined in its application to these oriental powers, and their rulers are in constant perplexity how far they can go. We all wish to encourage them in utilizing foreign skill, science, and integrity in acquiring and applying our arts and improvements for their advantage; and as soon as they become expert in their new powers they are not unlikely to employ them to overcome their enemies.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, May 30, 1874. (Received July 20.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose for your perusal a very clear account of the events which occurred at Shanghai on the 3d and 4th instant, taken from the "Courier," and a copy of Mr. Seward's report of his efforts in aiding to suppress the riot, (inclosure 1,) from which you will learn all that is of importance.

Mr. Seward's position as senior consul at Shanghai gave him much advantage in taking immediate action, and I have heard only one opinion in commendation of his promptness and sagacity. Preventive efforts are always difficult to estimate, but in this case everybody acknowledges that the landing of a detachment from the United States steamers Ashuelot and Yantic, at the hour it did, was most opportune. The mob was in fact rendered powerless by its appearance. I sincerely hope that the Department will fortify and indorse the public voice by its special approval of his action.

You will no doubt observe on the perusal of the printed narrative that the animus of the editor is strongly against the Chinese, and he does not seem to be disposed to wait till he can hear their side. I do not refer to the mob, for whose conduct I find no excuse, but to the proceedings of the Ningpo guild. It is not easy, at any time, to learn the exact truth about native opinion, but in this instance the views of the guild were early made known, and their temperate memorial (inclosure 2) and liberal proposition to arrange the matter sent to the council three months before the outbreak, places the latter, by its refusal or vacillation, in a position it could easily have avoided.

It is an outbreak much to be regretted, and its details will be reported through the provinces, I fear, so as to deepen the dislike and dread which is felt against foreigners. In the case of the Tien-tsin riot in 1870 it was easy to deny the truth of the rumors which excused it, that foreigners stole children for the sake of their eyes and hearts; and there are myriads of natives in other places who could corroborate the denial and help to re-assure their countrymen that the facts were otherwise.

But when the native newspapers circulate the story that half a score of their people have been shot or killed in Shanghai for resisting the encroachments of foreigners upon the graves of Chinese buried there, it will strike a sympathetic chord in the hearts of their readers. In a case somewhat similar, when Amaral, the enterprising governor of Macao, was assassinated in 1849 for cutting roads through the graves outside the city, the act was upheld by all natives as a just retribution for the dead. In this case at Shanghai the arguments and facts will tell against foreigners, and there will be very little opportunity to place either of them in a right light.

The argument used by the editor, that the guild knew that the roads had been long before mapped out to be opened through the graves, and the plea that many places in Shanghai, now covered with houses, had once been graveyards, are both entirely aside of the merits of this particular question. However, it is impossible to judge equitably until one knows the facts about the occupation of the French in this part of Shanghai.

I add a copy of my reply to Mr. Seward, (inclosure 3,) and defer further remark until another time. If this riot furnishes a good argument for a fusion of the two settlements, all parties would be ultimately the gainers.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, May 11, 1874.

SIR: I have heretofore advised you that a riot occurred in the French settlement on Sunday last.

Up to this moment no official inquiry has taken place in regard to its causes, or the merits of the grievance, as alleged by the Chinese. The consul-general for France has indeed, as it would appear, taken some conclusions, but he has not communicated them to his colleagues; nor do we know of them excepting from the local prints and newspapers. Under these circumstances I shall confine this report to a statement of my own connection with the affair in its various aspects, and I shall transmit to you with it such printed documents as will set forth all the information that I can now communicate.

The riot took place on Sunday, the 3d instant. I was informed of the existence of a difficulty while at my house, more than two miles from the scene, at about half past 6 o'clock in the evening. I at once drove to the residence of Dr. Yates, which was not more than a third of a mile from the place in question. I found that Dr. Yates, his son-in-law, Mr. Seaman, and Mr. Hill, had been observing the tendency of the affair, and they assured me that it was not unlikely to assume serious proportions.

Acting upon a preconceived idea of what should be done under such circumstances, I determined to ask our gunboats to land the largest possible force, and to place them where they could be of most use in a defensive way, and I proceeded to the French consulate to state my information and my conception of the measures which should be taken. Upon leaving Dr. Yates's house I saw that a fire had broken out, and that crowds of excited people were already moving down the Rue du Consulat, breaking the street lamps, and otherwise indicating their excitement. On reaching the French concession, I told Mr. Godeaux, the consul-general, what I had learned, and expressed my opinion that it would be well to land a force from the gunboats. He at once assented to this, and I proceeded to the Ashuelot and Yantic to secure the same. The commanders of these vessels yielded a ready assent to my request, and actually landed about a hundred men by 8.30 o'clock. Not anticipating that the rioters would have any disposition to proceed further in the face of the fact that this force was in hand, and that a squad of fifteen or twenty men from a French gunboat had been previously landed, I requested the commanding officer of the sailors to take them to the French consulate; I at the same time requested Mr. Bradford to remain with them, and to advise with Mr. Godeaux and the commanding officer in regard to their disposition, giving to him at the same time such general instructions as seemed appropriate. A meeting of the consuls had been called while I was thus engaged, and the hour for assembling having arrived, I proceeded to the place named for it, the Main-guard, to which the municipal council and the volunteers had also been summoned.

The question here arose what course should be pursued; and upon this point the chairman of the municipal council, as commandant of the volunteers, requested instructions from the consuls.

It was my opinion that one or two of the fire companies should proceed to the scene of the fire, guarded by the volunteers and our sailors, in order to put out the fire and make such a demonstration as would overawe the rabble; and this course was determined upon, the consuls and the chairman proceeding with the troops.

I may say that I was assured strongly that this course was the only one which could be pursued, having regard to all interests. If a fire was going on it should be put out. If the rabble was disposed to carry matters farther, nothing less than a demonstration of our ability to suppress them would answer. Neither was any danger to be apprehended. A Chinese mob will not fight foreigners, excepting as a pack of wolves will attack human beings, when in numbers and with full swing for their savagery. A squad of fifty men present during the day near the scene of the trouble, would have overawed the rabble and prevented all bloodshed.

In marching to the locality of the fire, I took about fifty of our sailors with the volunteers. I remained with the commanding officer, and informed both him and the commandant of the volunteers that I would be the sole medium of communication between them. I took this course because the responsibility of landing these men was mine, and because I felt unwilling that they should be asked to do any active work without my full knowledge and assent.

I should say here, that prior to my return to the French settlement from the Main-guard, reports had been received that the police station at the southern river corner of the settlement was in danger, and that Mr. Bradford had gone to its relief with a guard of the sailors.

Upon reaching the scene of the disturbances I found that, as I anticipated, the danger was over. The fire, too, was pretty nearly burned out, it having met obstructions which prevented it from spreading. Such measures were taken, however, to suppress it entirely, as were appropriate.

At this time information was brought that a band of the rioters had taken refuge in the Ningpo Joss-house, a rambling structure covering more than an acre of ground situated at the southwestern end of the settlement. It seemed advisable to determine whether this was the fact, and the force excepting an appropriate patrol moved at once to the place. The Chehsien, or district magistrate, who had previously appeared upon the scene of the riot, accompanied us.

The door of the joss-house, or wei-kuan, was found closed, and upon calling out to those supposed to be inside, no answer was received. Mr. Medhurst and myself then asked the magistrate to break in one of the doors, so as to enable us to make with him an inspection of the premises. This was effected by the foreign firemen with axes, the door selected having been barricaded with coffin material. The entry having been effected, a squad of the magistrate's soldiers with the magistrates and several of the consuls, proceeded to search, but found not one person.

It is likely that no one was there, and that, anticipating such a search, even those who usually occupy it had taken their departure. The force was then marched back to the municipal hall and the French consulate, at which places our sailors were to bivouac for the night.

Signals were agreed upon to call out the volunteers and fire companies if this should be necessary, and at 2 a. m. I returned to my residence.

I should mention that before retiring from the French settlement I waited on the French consul, and through his chancellor proposed a consuls' meeting for the next morning at his office. He returned word, further thanking me for the aid rendered to him, but intimating that he did not care to have me call the meeting. I make this statement not to find fault with Mr. Godeaux, but to be accurate in my narrative.

On Monday morning I proceeded to the French settlement at an early hour, and after visiting the scene of the riot and consulting with Mr. Godeaux, I sent the sailors off to their ships, asking the officer in command to say that if a fresh squad could be landed, it would gratify me. This was done with reasonable promptness, and the men, at my suggestion, bivouacked in an appropriate way. Later in the day I again arranged that a squad of fifty men should remain on shore for the night.

The further occurrences in the French settlement need no comment from me.

On Monday a consuls' meeting was held in my office, a minute of which will be found among the inclosed papers. Mr. Godeaux did not attend this meeting or make any communication to it.

The proclamation of the Taotai, made upon the request of this meeting, will also be found among the inclosed papers. It had not seemed to several of the body quite in accordance with the agreement made with him on Friday; therefore Mr. Medhurst, Mr. Schlik, and myself took advantage of a visit from the Taotai to urge him to issue another one in strict accordance with the agreement with the Taotai, and this has just come to hand.

I have received from several persons testimony to the careful manner in which the French police behaved. They appear to have been admirably handled, and to have refrained from using their weapons when provoked in the most extreme way.

Six Chinese were killed on Sunday. One has died since, and about ten or a dozen more or less severely wounded are under treatment in different places.

It will be found, I fear, that a large proportion of those killed met their death at the hands of persons armed by the French council, or upon no authority and under no adequate restraint.

There would have been no necessity to arm such men, and they might, if appearing on their own motion, have been arrested or turned back, if the riot had been checked at the outset by the landing of a suitable force, which would have left the police free to attend to their proper work.

I have no further details about the injuries suffered by foreigners than those stated in the inclosures. Mr. Fisher, with the modesty characteristic of many foreigners in such cases, values his bruised temple and two departed teeth at 10,000 taels, or $14,000. Rev. Mr. Allen and Mr. Haskell each lost a carriage.

You will see that the consular body have not entered upon the merits of the original dispute. We cannot well do so without an invitation from M. Godeaux or the Chinese authorities. We considered it our duty to state that we would give to either the benefit of our advice, if requested, and to stop there.

I shall not indulge now in remarks concerning the general bearings of the difficulties in question, or of the conduct of the French and native authorities, but may return to the subject hereafter.

I shall be glad to know what course should, in your view, be taken in regard to the losses of our people, as mentioned.

I am not quite sure that the prompt action which I took to land our sailors, especially in view of the fact that the French have charged themselves with the preservation of order in the French settlement, will be approved at first sight; but when it is remembered that American interests in that quarter are really greater than those of the French, and that the houses of the American families—viz, Dr. Yates's, Mr. Allen's, and Mr. Lambuth's—were nearer to the scene of the riot than any others, one would hesitate to say that the landing of our sailors was not called for by the circumstances.

To my mind, a riot, here or elsewhere, is to be met as a riot, and to be put down with a strong hand. To this view the Chinese authorities have assented, and both they and the French consul and council have specially thanked me for the aid which I rendered. The judgment which would vacillate at such a moment would, I fear, vacillate in those earlier stages of a difficulty when nothing would be required but a conception of what is right and a disposition to do it.

The riot presents, I think, no occasion for fear of what may come in the future, at least in Shanghai. The Chinese have seen that it is dangerous to proceed to such an extreme, and whatever encouragement they may have received from the way in which their demands were granted, almost at the moment of their demonstrations, they will hesitate to take up such a procedure in the future.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD, Consul-General.

[Extract from the Shanghai Evening Courier.]

THE RIOT IN THE FRENCH CONCESSION.

About 4.30 p. m. yesterday, the fire-bells of the settlement rang an alarm, which, taken in connection with the hoisting of the French flag over the bell towers, indicated the locality to be in the French concession; in which direction, therefore, all the fire companies of the Shanghai fire department were promptly on the march. But there was some difficulty in ascertaining the particular part of the concession, and as the firemen were making inquiries, they were met at various points by the information that the fire had been got under by the exertions of the French police and the engine of the M. M. Co. close to which it had taken place. But along with this came the information that the fire was the act of incendiaries, who had not only set fire to a block of buildings, but had violently assaulted several foreigners, who had narrowly escaped with their lives. Further inquiry ascertained that the whole thing resulted from that combination of the Ningpo residents of Shanghai to enforce certain claims they have recently advanced, in connection with their mortuary house of reception, (known as "Ningpo Joss-house,") and its surroundings, to which we drew attention on Saturday evening. An attempt made last night and to-day to investigate that claim with some degree of thoroughness, has made us acquainted with so many conflicting statements regarding it that we cannot feel assured that we have yet arrived at the truth, entire and unmixed. All that we propose to do now is to give as full and correct an account as we have been able to gather of the events of yesterday.

Early in the forenoon crowds had assembled in the open spaces lying between the Ningpo Joss-house, the city wall, and the French gas-works, similar to the crowds that had gathered there for the greater part of the previous week, except that instead of hundreds they had risen to thousands; and their concourse appeared less a fortuitous meeting, and more the result of a deliberate purpose. In fact, it had been communicated to not a few foreigners, by Ningpo men, with whom they were intimate, that the disaffected would on Sunday burn down certain buildings or sections of the concession; but the talk seemed so wild that it appears for the most part to have been allowed to pass unheeded. At all events, those who passed the place at noon, and for the next three hours, observed the whole of the open ground referred to covered with dense groups of Chinese, similar to those which one sees when some popular exhibition is going on, but on closer inspection, gathered from the loud language and fierce gesticulations of those who spoke, and from the sullen and wild appearance of the listening crowds, that they were in no holiday mood. Within the limits above mentioned the Rue Wei-kwei, running parallel with and to the north of the Rue du Consulat, is intersected eastward by the Rue Hué, and westward by the Rue des Pères, forming an oblong block, on the northern face of which is Rue Wei-kwei. At the corner of Rue Hué was a row of Chinese dwellings, west of which is a tenement lately built by M. Percebois, one-half occupied by his own family, the other tenanted by Miss J. Maclean, a British missionary lady; the remaining space, to the intersection of the Rue des Pères, was occupied by a two-story foreign dwelling-house, belonging to M. Charrier, whose outlying stables stretched backward as far as the Rue du Consulat, occupying all the rest of the block except a row of two-story Chino-foreign houses, (mostly occupied by Frenchmen,) forming the west side of the Rue Hué. About 3 p. m. a number of French firemen went up by appointment to the French gas-works, situated to the west of the Rue des Pères and north of the Rue Wei-kwei, abutting on their north front on the Yang-king-pang, the northern limit of the concession. The party went to get their photographs taken. The crowds, catching a glimpse of them going toward the gas-works, came rushing along in that direction. But when they approached the gas-works it is supposed they were induced to think of the seriousness of any too close contact with so explosive and mysterious a substance as gas. What is known is, that, after standing, yelling, and haranguing in the neighborhood of the works, a new direction and object was given to their views. Where they stood they were in view of the house of M. Percebois, to whom it has fallen, as surveyor or master of works to the French municipality, to mark off the improvements contemplated and in progress in the roads that run close to the Ningpo Joss-house. It is at present impossible to ascertain whether the crowd or their ringleaders had any definite programme previously resolved on, or whether the mob was simply excited in a general way, and open to any definite suggestion that might be given at random. What is certain is, that at about a quarter to 4 p. m. a rush was made for Percebois's house; it was beset before and behind by a howling mob; it was entered; he was violently torn out while attempting to defend his wife and a family of young children; he saw his wife dragged out by her hair, and his children fairly pitched into the street. What measures he took to prevent a downright massacre we have not learned. If the elderly Chinaman, who, with arms and legs naked, as if stripped for a fray, was soon afterward found close by Percebois's house, shot through the heart, was killed at this juncture, all we can say is that the violence was justifiable in the circumstances. But however he managed to deter the mob from proceeding to the last extremities, he did succeed, though with his own head laid open, his wife badly beaten and bruised, and his children hurt, though it is not thought seriously, in making his way to the municipal hall, about five hundred yards distant.

Meanwhile, about half past three, two Scotch gentlemen, Messrs. D. Cranston, of Pootung foundry, and John Weir, chief engineer of the Gordon castle, had called on Miss Maclean, living in the house adjoining that of M. Percebois. They had noticed the crowds of people, but thinking it was only some ordinary street "row," paid no particular attention to it. But as they sat and talked with Miss Maclean up-stairs, about 4 o'clock, they heard the rush of the crowds down the street, and the next moment heard the sounds of demolition going on all round M. Percebois's house. Seeing the immense number and wildness of the people, it was deemed wisest to keep still, so long as Miss Maclean's place was left untouched. From ten to fifteen minutes sufficed to reduce M. Percebois's house—a two-story house built on the Chinese plan—to a yawning ruin; the trees in the garden behind were torn up; some dogs tied up were beaten to death; and some turkeys, &c., were absolutely torn to pieces. The mob was now worked into a frenzy, and Miss Maclean, looking cautiously out from her back windows, saw them almost in a minute tear down the fence that separated her back premises from those of M. Percebois, and arm themselves with the rails that composed it. Presently her out-houses were demolished, and seeing signs of further damage she resolved to parley with them. Stepping out on the back verandah she told them that whatever quarrel they had with M. Percebois, she had nothing to do with it, as she was only a tenant. She had scarce uttered the words when a shower of bricks forced her to withdraw, and simultaneously bricks were thrown at the front windows, and she and her friends were forced to seek refuge from the fragments of glass and flying missiles on the landing of the staircase. After the shower of bricks had lasted some minutes the front door was forced, the lower rooms were entered, and the forms, chairs, and other furniture were broken up and converted into weapons. This over, they came up stairs, headed by one who was unarmed, and who appeared, on the whole, anxious to restrain the violence of the others. Miss Maclean tried to remonstrate with him, but the crowd behind raved and struck with their weapons, and presently pushed him aside into one of the upper rooms, the furniture of which also they began to smash. Miss Maclean, thus brought face to face with violence, determined to go down stairs, and was allowed to do so unmolested, followed by the two gentlemen. But as soon as they were outside, while Miss Maclean, closely followed by Mr. Cranston, who was trying to protect her, was hustled by the crowd across the street, and somewhat in the direction of the gas-works, Mr. Weir was borne away eastward, and ere he had gone a few yards was struck down by a blow which laid his head open. While he lay on the ground the crowd around beat madly at him, but their closeness around him, the length of their bludgeons, and their frantic fury, combined to save him from a death that seemed inevitable. Watching a chance he suddenly sprang up, and, as he did so, siezed a brick, menacing them with which he advanced on the crowd, who opened before him, but closed with threatening yells behind; and thus, turning from side to side, with his eye over his shoulder, he kept using the menace of the brick to open up his way. Again he was tripped up, fell, and was badly beaten; again he started up, and grasping a heavy piece of paling from one of the crowd, brought it down to the charge, (his arms were now so bruised that he could not raise it higher.) With this he pushed his way along, having constantly to turn and stand at bay when the crowd came too close, till, at last, getting into a clearer place, he ran as fast as his remaining strength permitted, and reported the affair at municipal hall, urging the necessity of an immediate attempt to save Miss Maclean and Mr. Cranston. He complains of the length of time it took to get the police under arms, and of the fact that for a time no cartridges could be found.

Meanwhile, Mr. Cranston, by keeping his hands on either side of Miss Maclean, protected her from the blows aimed at her, till he was struck down by a severe blow on the head, and Miss Maclean was at once dragged by her hair into the gutter beside him. Both were badly beaten while they were down. One inhuman monster lifted a section of a heavy plank with both hands, and striking her on the wrist inflicted a horrible bruise and abrasion. She was also wounded on the head, and badly bruised and cut generally. Mr. Cranston was treated in a similar manner. How she got up she cannot tell, but as she was being hustled and beaten along she began to hear voices in the crowd asserting that she was not a French woman, but belonged to the English, with whom they had no quarrel. Just then a tea-shop was reached, into which they were pushed by the party that seemed friendly to them. The woman who kept the tea-shop, in evident apprehension for the safety of her place, attempted to push her foreign sister back again among the fiends who raged outside, but this was prevented. The friendly party at length succeeded in inducing the furies to ask Miss Maclean if she was English, and on her saying that she was, the crowd at once became calmer; some even expressing regret, and an escort was formed, by which she and Mr. Cranston were conveyed to Mrs. Manthei's, who lives close by. It would appear that as soon as the crowd became convinced that Miss Maclean was not French, the breakage of her furniture was stopped, so that when some foreigners went round from Mrs. Manthei's to save whatever was left, they recovered most of her personal effects, the loss being restricted to the furniture. To close this part of the subject, we are glad to say that Miss Maclean, though suffering severely from pain, has not sustained any permanent injury; that Mr. Weir, though in great pain and a good deal disfigured, has been able to go about to-day. Mr. Cranston, who has suffered most severely, is in the general hospital, and is, we believe, doing favorably.

During or immediately after the assault on Miss Maclean, the mob resolved to consummate the destruction of M. Percebois's house, and fired it. How the fire was extinguished we have explained in our opening remarks. M. Barbe, the superintendent of the French police, on hearing of the riot and the fire, having no orders how to act, directed all the available force to arm themselves, and marching them to Percebois's, they kept guard while the firemen extinguished the flames. Meanwhile, M. Barbe had sent a message to the French consul-general, informing him of the state of things, and asked for instructions. Round the scene of the fire the crowd surged and howled and threw brick-bats, and one of them, seeing the police maintain an imperturbable patience, went the length of making the most insulting gestures and uttering the filthiest language, winding up by a bold defiance to shoot him if they dared. The sergeant on duty bravely seized him, and though the roar and rage of the crowd threatened a desperate and bloody rescue, he was retained, and marched back to the municipal hall, escorted by the police, on the conclusion of the fire operations. At this stage of the operations, from 5 to 6 p. m., many foreigners approached the center of the melee more or less closely, and some were roughly handled; and all felt it was prudent to retire, the general opinion being that still more serious mischief was brewing. When the municipal police returned to the station, a message from M. Godeaux (the consul-general) was waiting, conveying to M. Barbe the inane instruction that he was "to be prudent," or words to that effect. As there were now assembled at the municipality a number of French and other gentlemen, many of them ex-members of the French volunteer corps of 1870, M. Barbe's idea of prudence included the idea of arming these, and thus raising his effective force to from sixty to eighty men. But while this was in preparation, M. Rouhaud, the secretary of the consul-general, arrived with positive orders that no such step was on any account to be taken; a decision which excited general, and, we think, very natural, dissatisfaction.

We presume it must have been in consequence of this strange determination of M. Godeaux to take no action, and make no inquiry in the matter, that M. Voisin, chairman of the French municipal council, in view of the important foreign as well as the French interests that were involved, at 6.30 p. m. sent a request to Mr. Fearon, chairman of the Shanghai municipality, for the support of the Shanghai volunteer company. Mr. Fearon acted with commendable promptitude and vigor. The foreign consuls were convened through Mr. Seward, their chairman, to meet at the Main-guard at 9 p. m., where also the volunteers were invited to meet. All the consuls in town assembled, except M. Godeaux, who did not even send any communication; and after the mature deliberation which so important and, in the special circumstance, so difficult a matter required, it was decided that the volunteers should march in a united body to the French municipality, and there act in co-operation with any other available forces, as might be found necessary or expedient.

Meanwhile what all had feared had taken place. The fire at the house of Percebois was rekindled, spread to Charrier's stables adjoining, and thence to other blocks contiguous, being only arrested by the vigor and courage of Mr. Brodie A. Clarke, fire-engineer for the British settlement, most ably seconded by Mr. J. H. Vail and the Hongkew hook and ladder company, of which he is foreman. But resuming our detailed narrative of the events of Sunday at the point where we left off last night, we start with the state of things between 6 and 7 p. m. At that hour a tumultuous mob, composed almost exclusively of unemployed mawfoos, miscellaneous loafers and rowdies, and professional thieves, held possession of that block of the concession in which M. Percebois's house is situated, and of the contiguous streets. The small armed party of foreigners, who had barely kept them at bay while the fire was being extinguished, had retired, and were now cooped up within the municipal compound, and, for aught that could be seen, they had succeeded in resisting and cowing the authorities of the concession. The foreigners who ventured to reconnoiter the outskirts of the mob, returned with the conviction that more extended mischief would ensue. And we have since learned, as a matter of fact, that at this time warnings were issued to the Chinese occupants of foreign-owned houses to remove their furniture, as the municipal hall and all the intervening property was to be burned. The French consul-general undoubtedly was, and in any case he ought to have been, apprised of this state of things, and yet, so far as was known, he had taken no measures, even of a precautionary character. In these circumstances M. Voisin, chairman of the French municipal council, did all that he could do—sent a request to Mr. Fearon, chairman of the municipal council north of the Yank-king-pang, requesting the assistance of the Shanghai municipal volunteers. Mr. Fearon signified his willingness to accede, and, rightly considering that the interests of the members of many, if not of all, of the nationalities represented in Shanghai were involved, requested George F. Seward, esq., the senior consul, to convene a meeting of the consular body at the Main-guard, at 9 p. m., while he himself, through the officers of the Shanghai volunteer company, summoned that body to assemble at the same place and hour.

Meanwhile, the ringleaders of the mob, having paused for a time either for rest or deliberation, resumed their lawless proceedings. They set fire to what remained of M. Percebois's house. They appear to have had some compunctions about doing any more harm to Miss Maclean's house, but these were speedily overborne by the more savage of the party, and it also was set on fire; and then the mob, being fairly warmed to their work, rushed frantically about, carrying wisps of burning straw, and set fire to M. Charrier's coach-houses and stables. Most of the horses were got out, but almost all the carriages, including some valuable broughams, recently imported from France, were destroyed. The glare of the fire was soon seen from the top of the municipal clock-tower, and the usual fire-alarms again summoned the Shanghai fire-brigade to the rescue. A personal inspection by the chief engineer, in the afternoon, of the state of things, led him to the opinion that the sending of the fire companies indiscriminately into the concession might be dangerous. Almost all the fire-engines are manned by Chinese—some of them by Ningpo men, and only officered by foreigners—and it was just possible that if they went into the crowd, and an attack was made, they might refuse to fight against their compatriots, if they did not take active part with them, the effect of which might be most disastrous. Most of the Mih-ho-loongs, too, belong to the Shanghai volunteer company, in which capacity their presence was required at the Main-guard. It was, therefore, resolved, even after the various engines had already started for the fire, to request them all to retire until such time as the volunteers might, if the fire continued, be able to accompany and defend them. Meanwhile, the Hongkew hook and ladder company, which is manned by foreigners exclusively, was allowed to proceed toward the fire to reconnoiter and ascertain what was going on. To this party those of the Mih-ho-loongs not on military duty attached themselves. We must leave them marching over the bund bridge of the Yang-king-pang to ascertain what has been doing elsewhere.

M. Voisin had first heard of the disturbance at 5.30, when driving out toward the Bubbling Well. He hurried back to the municipal hall, where he found the police and some volunteers under arms, but unable to do anything owing to the consul's order. By this time a dense crowd surrounded the municipal compound, and began to throw stones and to pull up a fence; two shots also were fired, and the bullets were heard whistling overhead. M. Voisin, taking advantage of a carriage on the premises, and carrying his revolver in his hand, drove through the crowd to the French consulate-general and urged the necessity of active measures. The consul insisted that the disturbance was quite over, and was not prepared to do anything. M. Voisin then obtained M. Godeaux's sanction to apply, as already mentioned, to Mr. Fearon, and hearing immediately afterward that the fire had been relighted, hurried back to M. Godeaux, and after much altercation induced him to send to the lieutenant commanding the French gun-boat Couleuvre for assistance. In response to this twenty sailors came on shore in charge of a lieutenant. He also pointed out to M. Godeaux the necessity of using forcible measures to prevent further outrages, but to no purpose. M. Godeaux kept repeating his favorite formula: "It is necessary to be prudent." It was at length resolved that the sailors should be marched to the municipal hall, and there await the course of events. It was about this time, (7.30,) we believe, that M. Godeaux applied to the Taotai for assistance.

The Hongkew hook and ladder company, on reaching the municipal hall, found the party of seamen and the police under arms. They also met with Mr. Brodie A. Clarke, district engineer for the British settlement, who, in the absence of M. Charrier, engineer for the French concession, took charge. The other officers present were Messrs. J. H. Vail, foreman; and W. B. Langhorn, ——— Allen, and Perks, assistants. It was resolved to push on through the crowd, the sailors and police forming a guard, under the command of the lieutenant. With bayonets leveled to the charge, the little band advanced; the crowd gave way pell-mell; one ringleader, who had made himself conspicuous and most offensive, fell into a ditch in his flight, and received a sharp admonition a posteriori with a bayonet. In this way the hook and ladder company advanced with their escort up the Rue du Consulat toward the fire, which by this time had burned its way back through Charrier's stables to the Rue du Consulat. At this point it may be proper to state that immediately on the second fire-alarm being heard, Mr. Penfold, with his three inspectors and a detachment of the police of the northern settlement, hastened to the scene, and found men busy spreading the fire by means of straw, &c. Two of the ringleaders were particularly noted. As soon as the incendiaries saw the foreign police they desisted, and the two leaders referred to skulked off. They were, however, followed by two of Mr. Penfold's acolytes, and as soon as a quiet corner was reached they were secured by the latter—a quiet and artistic catch! No disposition was shown to attack the foreign police. Indeed, officers and men alike were told they had better go away; nobody wanted to harm them; the quarrel was with the French alone. Mr. Penfold, finding, we presume, that he could do nothing effective over so large an area with the men at his disposal, drew off his men and went to the municipal hall to secure co-operation. He reached there before the Couleuvre's men had arrived, and found M. Voisin and M. Barbe. Mr. Voisin greatly wished Mr

Penfold's assistance, but according to the "reglements" of the concession, the chairman of the council has no authority over the police. Mr. Penfold said that if he had five additional men he would undertake to prevent further trouble. We have no doubt M. Barbe would very gladly have placed twice that number at his disposal, but without further orders from M. Godeaux his hands were tied; and Mr. Penfold, remarking that if he could be of no use he had no right to keep his men there, retired across the Yangking-pang. Thus it came that when the hooks and ladders and their escort reached the fire, they were alone. Besides, of the twenty seamen who had accompanied them thus far, fifteen had orders to go on and throw themselves into the French gas-works, so as to avert the threatened danger of incendiarism and consequent explosion. These, therefore, were conducted onward by Mr. FitzHenry, of the gas-works. The small band of sailors and police stood with their bayonets pointed at the seething mob around them, while the red-shirts went to work with a will, and began to tear down the buildings burning nearest to those untouched. By this time all the block in which M. Percebois's house stood, including a row of dwelling-houses occupied by Frenchmen, running from the Rue du Consulat along the west side of Rue Hué, was burned down, except a small block occupied by Chinese, at the corner where the latter street is intersected by the Rue Wei-kwei. A row of dwellings on the east side of the Rue Hué from the Rue du Consulat northward, was being busily set on fire when the red-shirts came on the ground, and was in a few minutes all ablaze, the only part of the row spared as far as the Rue Wei-kwei being again a few houses occupied by Chinese. We italicise these facts to show that if the mob was mad, there was a method in its madness, and we may here note the additional fact that from hundreds of houses spared by the fire, lying between those burned and the municipal hall, the furniture was removed, this having been done, as we are assured, in pursuance of the announced intention of the mob to burn its way right forward till it was able to put the cope-stone on its work by burning the municipal hall. The building to which the hooks and ladders devoted their principal attention was that at the southeast corner of the Rue Hué and the Rue du Consulat. This building was on fire, and within six feet of it, down the Rue du Consulat, runs a row of handsome and substantial newly-erected Chinese buildings, which must in all probability have been totally destroyed, had the corner house been allowed to burn down. The hooks, and ropes, and axes were vigorously plied, and soon the house was tumbled to pieces and the fire smothered in its fall. The heat certainly was still intense, but the house was separated from the new buildings by a solid fire-wall, which the wary firemen took care to leave standing, and the new buildings having a fire-wall also, further danger in this quarter was averted. Scarcely had this most valuable result been accomplished, when an order is said to have arrived from M. Godeaux, so singular, that we can hardly bring ourselves to believe that it could have emanated even from him; if it did, we can only say that his education has been perfect in the art of "how not to do it." What is reported is, that at the juncture we have now reached, an order arrived from him directing the hook and ladder company to retire into the northern settlement. The company therefore limbered up and retired, heartily disgusted. They have since, however, had the satisfaction of knowing that where they had arrested the fire, there it remained. If it is asked why, when this last obstacle was swept away and the mob remained for two hours undisputed masters of all west of the municipal hall, except the gas-works, they did not resume their work of plunder and destruction, two solutions present themselves. First, the contiguous houses may have belonged to Ningpo men. We know for certain that the new row of buildings mentioned is owned by a man from the Ningpo district, and, if we mistake not, an influential member of the guild. On former occasions, when the Shanghai fire-department has rescued his property from fire, he has advertised his thanks in handsome terms. Why, on this occasion, is he silent? Another notable fact is, that an extensive store in the neighborhood of the devastation, presenting a most tempting collection of loot, was left wholly untouched. Its owner is a Ningpo man. Everything goes to show that, while the mob consisted almost wholly of the lowest rowdies, it was at its wildest moments under systematic guidance. Of this, however, we shall have more to say hereafter. But, secondly, apart from any desire to save the property of their compatriots, the rioters, by the time the Hongkew company left the ground—about 9.15 p. m.—had other reasons to abstain from further violence. They knew that the Chehsien and his retinue had gone to the French consulate-general; that the Taotai had been appealed to to send troops; that the Shanghai volunteers were called out; and they probably by this time knew that a considerable force had been landed from the United States vessels of war Ashuelot and Yantic.

Mr. Seward, United States consul-general, had learned early in the day, from Dr. Yates, United States vice-consul-general, who resides near the disturbed district, that some serious trouble was brewing; and after driving round the place for himself, and subsequently hearing of the attack upon foreigners, he deemed it right to apply to his senior naval officer for a guard, at least sufficient to insure the safety of Dr. Yates's family. As further symptoms developed themselves, he intrusted to Mr. O. B. Bradford, of the United States consulate-general, the securing of as large a force as could be spared from the Ashuelot and Yantic, for the general protection, the result being that about 9.30 p. m. some seventy-eight men and a Gatling gun were landed at the French consulate-general. At the request of M. Godeaux eighteen of these and the Gatling gun were left to protect the consulate-general, the rest were marched up to the municipal hall to await events. After they had been there for about half an hour, news arrived from the little east gate that the French police-station there had been attacked by a mob, and Mr. Bradford was directed to conduct twenty of the American marines to its defense, which was successfully accomplished, and the post occupied by them till they were relieved by a company of Chinese foreign-drilled soldiers, detached for the purpose from the one hundred and fifty sent by the Taotai in answer to the consul-general's application. Thus, at the point at which we have arrived, if we include thirty armed police, twenty Coulevre's men, seventy-eight of the United States Navy, and one hundred and thirty or so of native troops, there was a force of about two hundred and sixty men massed at or near the municipal hall about 10.30 p. m. At this hour they were joined by about two hundred of the Shanghai volunteer company, instructed by the meetings of consuls and council, as already related, to act in co-operation with those they found there. To the thousands of undisciplined Chinese there was opposed a well-equipped and disciplined force of nearly five hundred men.

Resuming our narrative of the riot, we find the troops of the Taotai, the naval parties from the United States Navy and from the Coulevre, the Shanghai volunteers, the armed French police, (with the Hongkew hook and ladder company and Deluge No. 4 engine company, to do fire-duty under protection of the Shanghai volunteer company, in case it should be wanted,) to the aggregate number of about five hundred men, at the municipal hall about 10.30 on Sunday night. After consultation, the troops of the Taotai were picketed throughout the disturbed quarter, with the instructions to seize all suspicious characters; the police and the Coulevre men guarded the municipal hall, and the volunteers marched in column through the scene of the disturbances. All was still, and the streets deserted by the people; the débris of the buildings destroyed were smouldering into blackness, and occasionally flaring up into fierce flame. Here and there dead bodies of Chinese were seen lying. While the volunteers were making this patrol, the consular body, escorted by the United States naval party, and the chehsien, guarded by a squad of native troops, went to the Ningpo Joss-house, the source or central point of all the trouble; and as it was reported that the ring-leaders of the riot had taken their quarters there, it was proposed to enter and search. Several of the doors were knocked at, but there was no response; upon which Mr. Seward, the senior consul, suggested to the chehsien that an entrance should be forced. The naval party was directed to guard the east side of the building to prevent any inmate from escaping, while the rest of the circuit was intrusted to the volunteers, who had now completed their patrol. The attendants of the chehsien attempted to burst open or unhinge the massive doors, but they were found too strong and too closely fitted into the massive stone door-posts and lintels to be practicable. The chehsien reported himself unable to effect an entrance. On this the Hongkew hook and ladder company was sent for by Mr. Seward, and, the chehsien's sanction having been obtained, they set themselves to the task. But against the repeated and energetic blows of their ram the door was proof. It was then resolved to cut a hole through the door large enough to admit a man, which being done, one of the number got through, and found a perfect mass of the thick wooden slabs of which the Chinese make their coffins jammed at the back of the door at the strongest angle of resistance. These were removed piecemeal and an entrance effected. The chehsien requested that none should enter the building except the consuls, himself, and some of his escort. Careful search was made all through the extensive premises, but no living person was to be seen; it was pure and simple a habitation of the dead. The absence of watchman, servant, or attendant of any kind was, indeed, suspicious, and some sharp eyes there were that saw a ladder so placed as to suggest the idea that the occupants of the place had taken refuge on the roof; but the awkwardness that would result if the idea proved erroneous prevented a proposal to search from being made.

Arrangements were then made for keeping guard over the concession during the night, which duty was shared between the French police and the Taotai's troops, while the detachment of the Ashuelot's men left at the French consulate-general remained there during the night. The Shanghai volunteers, having again fallen in at the Joss-house, marched back to the bund in the reverse order in which they came, and near the customs-house, having been formed in column, Captain Hart (to borrow the language of the Daily News) "addressed a few words of thanks to the men for the steadiness with which they had obeyed orders, and announced that in case of a fresh alarm four guns would be fired from the United States corvette Ashuelot, when they were at once to muster at the main-guard. Mr. Fearon, as civil commandant of the corps, also complimented the men upon the readiness with which they had turned out, and on their steady and soldierly bearing. Fortunately, their active services had not been needed, but their conduct gave a proof of their efficiency, which would increase the confidence of the community in their capacity to maintain order if required. He thanked them in the name of the community." The force was then dismissed about half past midnight.

The general result of the affray, so far as the persons of foreigners were concerned, was that a number of persons had had their heads cut and their persons bruised with bricks, &c., including, more especially, Mr. A. A. Fisher, who had his temple laid open, his lip badly cut, and two of his teeth knocked out by stones, &c., thrown at him while driving past the crowd on his way home from Sicawei; besides the still more serious injuries sustained by M. Percebois and his family, by Miss Maclean, and by Messrs. Cranston and Weir. On the side of the aggressors the casualties were much more numerous and severe. As we have stated, one Chinaman was shot through the heart on the steps of M. Percebois's house, between four and five in the afternoon. When the police and Coulevre party were escorting the hook and ladder company to the fire, one of the most prominent rioters received a bayonet-wound, of which he afterward died. The party who went to defend the gas-works while on their way there were assailed with bricks and stones, and, having fired some warning shots without effect, are said to have fired into the crowd; with what result is not known. As we have stated, a number of civilians gathered at the municipal hall in the afternoon and expressed their willingness to assist the police if supplied with arms. As there was no evidence of a regular force being summoned by M. Godeaux to support the police, M. Barbe thought it prudent to arm these volunteers, but, in accordance with orders received from M. Godeaux, they were kept within the municipal compound, and when the gates were opened to admit the Coulevre's men, a number of them slipped out and took their arms with them. This was unfortunate, as some of them do not appear to have been of a character or in a condition to be trusted with weapons; and there is concurrent testimony to show that they, with probably others carrying weapons of their own, went about firing and using their bayonets without authority, which was bad, and often where it was totally uncalled for and mischievous, which was worse. The total result was that six were found dead on the ground, and eight wounded were taken to the Chinese hospital, one of whom afterward died. So that the casualties among the Chinese, so far as at present known, were seven dead and seven wounded.

On Monday morning the scene of the disturbance of the previous day presented a singular spectacle. The smouldering embers of the houses burned; long rows of contiguous houses emptied of their contents, and more or less battered, or carefully barricaded; the groups of native foreign-drilled troops, with rifles stacked and side-arms ready for use, lounging at extemporized guard-houses in every street, or marching slowly up and down their "beat;" a dense crowd around the Ningpo Joss-house and groups scattered over all the open ground, and everywhere throngs of natives, who had evidently come from all quarters sight-seeing, interspersed here and there with a foreigner or two. Among the débris of the houses, groups were, as customary, groping in the hope of securing some fragment that might still be useful. But the most peculiar feature was the long string of wheelbarrows piled high with furniture and household stuff, which were seen in all directions making for the northern settlement—the property of people who were hastening from the concession, either from the fear of punishment for participation in the riot, or to avoid being involved in the consequences of another. It was estimated that no fewer than eight hundred left for Ningpo on Monday alone, while the crowds for Soochow were such as to enhance the charge for boat-hire 300 per cent., the fares of wheelbarrows being raised in an equal ratio. Besides this, a large number who had been attracted to live in the concession by lighter taxes or cheaper rents, now hastened to domicile themselves and their belongings in what they seem to consider the safer region of the northern settlement; the obvious result being a stiffening of the rents of native houses in the latter locality, and a corresponding downward tendency in those of the concession.

While the native community was thus occupied, the authorities, native and foreign, naturally had their hands full of the affair. The two incendiaries captured by the foreign police were sent to the mixed court of the French concession, to be dealt with, along with from twenty-five to thirty others who had been caught raising fire, taking part in the riot or plundering. It was resolved to remand them till the following day. The French consul-general, in the forenoon, requested M. Voisin to call a meeting of the French municipal council to reconsider the subject of the roads adjoining Ningpo Joss-house, which had been the original cause of the trouble. Several times afterwards in the course of the day he saw M. Godeaux, the last time being when he was on his way, and told M. Godeaux he was on his way to the meeting of council called at his request. We insert here the minutes of that meeting with translation:

COUNCIL OF MUNICIPAL ADMINISTRATION FOR THE FRENCH CONCESSION.

[Translation.]

"On the 4th May, 1874, the municipal council of the French concession met under the presidency of M. Voisin. Councilors present: Messrs. Ewald, Hennequin, Hitch Lang, Maignan, Millot; M. Sayn, secretary.

"The council was assembled at the request of the consul-general, addressed to the president, for the purpose of taking into consideration the circumstances which have excited among the Chinese populace an agitation which it is of importance to allay as soon as possible, and to entertain anew the question which has created that effervescence.

"The council is of opinion that there should be addressed to the consul-general a letter to the following effect:

"The Consul-General:

"SIR: At your request I have just convoked the municipal council, which resolves that, in view of the excesses which were committed yesterday, it cannot discuss anew the question of the streets Saigon and Ningpo until the disturbance has disappeared and justice has been done.

"Then the council will be most willing to reconsider the question, and to inform you of its final decision.

"This resolution has been adopted unanimously.

"THE PRESIDENT."

"The council expresses, at the same time, the opinion that the regrettable events which took place yesterday might have been easily stopped at the outset by a more energetic attitude on the part of the consul-general.

"VOISIN.

"HENNEQUIN.

"HITCH.

"MAIGNAN.

"LANG.

"MILLOT.

"EWALD."

It will be observed that the decision of the council on the point referred to their reconsideration was, that after the violence and outrage that had been committed with the apparent object of compelling compliance with those who claimed the right to interdict the roads objected to, the council could not entertain the question at all, till due investigation into the riot had been made and justice done in regard to it. It may be imagined, therefore, what their astonishment was to learn, as they left the council chamber, that during, if not before, their sitting a proclamation by the consul-general had been generally posted throughout the concession, of which the following translation has been given:

"AN URGENT PROCLAMATION.

"Since I have been in office in Shanghai, all the merchants of the settlement have received protection and lived in quietude. At present, erroneous reports have been spread, stating that the French intend to remove or destroy the buildings of the Sz-ming-kung-so, (Ningpo Joss-house,) and that it is also intended to build horse-roads on the grounds, and thus to interfere with or damage the graves. These are the reports of worthless men, who are spreading false rumors to excite the people. The head men of the Sz-ming-kung-so at present petition to have the plans of the roads changed, and a further request has been received from the Taotai and likewise one from the Chehsien, begging that we will give consideration to the public feeling. An instruction has accordingly been sent to the municipal council to reconsider and change their previous plans, so as not to injure the buildings of the guild or to disturb the graves in the cemetery. They are not only not to construct a road, but they are to desire the head men of the Sz-ming-kung-so to erect a wall round the limits of their property, to define the boundaries, and thus avoid future misunderstanding.

"The foregoing proclamation was about to be issued when, unexpectedly, a lot of foolish people, not waiting for a reply to their representations, daringly assembled together and created disturbance. The matter is much to be regretted, and on this account we issue a proclamation ordering all the merchants and people in the concession that they should live peaceably and attend to their business, and not give ready ear to false reports, which lead to matters to be repented of when too late."

It will be observed that this proclamation must have been already printed when M. Voisin met M. Godeaux, and told him he was on his way to the council-meeting, called at M. Godeaux's request, to consider what was to be done about the disputed roads. M. Godeaux's proclamation concedes all, and more than all, the demands of the Chinese that the council was summoned to consider. Yet M. Godeaux allowed M. Voisin to go on to transact business which the former had already done all in his power to reduce to a farce. It is matter of double congratulation that the decision of the council was such as we see. We may here state that up to the present time the council has no official information of the purport or existence of the consul-general's decret.

Meanwhile, the senior consul invited his official brethren to meet the Taotai, in order to take into joint consideration the general state of affairs: From this meeting, also, M. Godeaux was absent, being probably occupied with the publication of his own "urgent proclamation." The result of the deliberations of the consular body is set forth in the following official minutes, which, although we published them two days since, we think it well to re-introduce here, in order to set this document in juxtaposition and contrast with that which M. Godeaux saw fit to issue on his own responsibility:

"MEETING OF TREATY CONSULS.

"Minutes of a special meeting of consuls at Shanghai, held in consequence of the riot on the French concession on Sunday, the 3d May, 1874.

"The consuls are of opinion that order should be maintained in the foreign settlements, and they are prepared to use all the force available on the part of foreigners, in concert with the force at the command of the Taotai, for the purpose.

"They are further of opinion that immediate measures should be taken by the French authorities and the Taotai for the arrest and punishment of offenders in the disturbance of yesterday.

"They are further of opinion that it is unnecessary for the consular body to enter into the merits of the present difficulty, but they are prepared to give the benefit of their advice in the matter, upon the request of either the French consul-general or the Taotai.

"They are further of opinion that no persons should be permitted to appear publicly in the streets with arms, unless under authority.

"His excellency the Taotai having been invited to join the meeting, and the above having been communicated to him, he agreed after consultation to issue forthwith a proclamation embodying the following points—

"1. That the present difficulty was in course of adjustment by the proper authorities when the mob began the riot.

"2. That such demonstrations by mobs cannot and will not be permitted. When disputes arise they should always be settled by the authorities, and that any attempt by the populace to take the law into their own hands will be promptly redressed by all available foreign and Chinese force.

"3. That all quiet, well-disposed persons are called upon to discourage rioting of every kind, and to maintain order.

"4. That the Chinese authorities are taking measures to arrest and punish the ring-leaders in the late disturbance.

"W. H. MEDHURST,
"Her Majesty's Consul.

"E. LUEDER,
"Kais Konsul.

"F. B. FORBES,
"Consul-General of Sweden and Norway.

"L. VIGNALE,
"Italian Consul-General.

"RUDOLF SCHLICK,
"Austro-Hungarian Consul.

"J. E. REDING,
"Acting H. I. R. M.'s Vice-Consul.

"ALFRED DENT,
"Acting Vice-Consul for Portugal.

"E. H. SLAGHEK,
"Consul for Netherlands.

"W. KESWICK,
"Acting Danish Consul.

"J. J. DE EMPERANZA,
"Consul for Spain.

"ED. MOREL,

"GEORGE F. SEWARD,
"United States Consul-General."

Perhaps the best appendix we can give to this section of our narrative will be to reproduce the translation of the following series of Chinese proclamations to which the affair has given rise, and which we copy from to-day's Daily News.

First comes a notice by the Ningpo guild, which purports to have been written with the object of averting disturbance, though it is a question whether it was issued till after the riot:

"PROCLAMATION BY THE NINGPO GUILD.

"The guild has already petitioned the Taotai and hsien in the above matter, and these authorities are in correspondence with the French consul-general, begging him to direct the municipality to alter the proposed course of the roads; and the matter is all but satisfactorily adjusted. Let all our fellow provincials, therefore, mind each his own business, and not assemble in crowds to follow unlawful counsels and create disturbances,

"Tung-chih, 13th year, 3d moon."

The following proclamation, in which the Taotai affects to regard the fire as purely accidental, and the mob as merely the usual assemblage of spectators, matches, in the liberties it takes with truth for purposes of government, anything to be found in Macchiavelli or the Eikon Basiliké. It was issued on the night after the fire, (3d May)

"A GENERAL PROCLAMATION.

"Whereas, on the French side some houses caught fire, and the populace assembled in multitudes to witness it, I then sent out mandarins with seals [the Chehsien and waiyuen, or official deputy of the Taotai] to lead soldiers to put out the fire and to restrain the mob. The Ningpo merchants of Shanghai and people generally should attend to their own affairs and keep order. If there should be any found inventing idle stories and inflaming the minds of the populace, or laying hold of causes to create a disturbance, they must be regarded as vagabonds and ruffians who have no respect for the law, and will be at once arrested and dealt with summarily. It is proper that I should inform the soldiers and people by proclamation that they must, one and all, respect and not disobey the laws."

Earlier on the same day the same magistrate had prepared the following proclamation, but which, though bearing that date, is said not to have been issued till the following day, (4th May :)

"A GENERAL PROCLAMATION.

"It appears that the owners of the lands of the Sz-ming-kung-so have asked that the opening of a road shall not be carried out. Some time ago the head men of the Ningpo guild, Chow Ta-lin, Chow-Chung, and others, came to the Yamun with a petition, and I at once communicated with the French consul-general, requesting that he would order the members of the municipal council to act in accordance with it. Although I did not receive an official [or written] answer, a Waiyuen [deputy or interpreter] had already communicated the consul-general's verbal reply, to the effect that the councilors were absent from Shanghai, and that it would be necessary to await their return, when the matter would be discussed. The consul-general, however, with a clear perception of Chinese affairs, knowing that the Sz-ming-kung-so had existed for a very long period, that the graves there are extremely numerous, and that if the road was opened it would be difficult to avoid injury to them, promised to instruct the council to stay proceedings, and thus to bring the affair to a satisfactory termination. The heads of the Sz-ming-kung-so had waited also on the consul-general with a petition, and earnestly entreated him, and he likewise assented to their request. All this is on record. It therefore behooves people quietly to wait till the matter is discussed and settled. There is no reason for seeking excuses to create a disturbance. I hope that the people and merchants of Ningpo will in future attend to their occupations, and carefully keep within the pale of the law. You must not lightly believe idle stories and illicitly cause commotion, laying yourselves open to be brought to trial and examined and punished. There will be no excuse. Do not disobey. A special proclamation."

The next and last proclamation, issued yesterday, (5th May,) is based on the consul-general's placard of the day before, and shows how eager his excellency is to give to the questionable concession made by the consul-general the force of an accomplished fact:

"H. E. SHEN, Taotai, issues another proclamation for general information.

"It appears now that the horse-road is not to be constructed within the bounds of the Sz-ming-kung-so; and I have directed the elders of the guild to immediately put up a wall in order to define the boundaries. I have already personally interviewed the French consul, and by consultation arranged that he will issue a proclamation, and I have no doubt that the proclamation in question has been generally seen. In all matters connected with foreigners and Chinese, the people should invariably await the decision of the mandarins, and should not create disturbances. If, after this, rowdy characters do not respect the injunctions of the authorities, but concoct idle stories, and inflame the hearts of the multitude even unto quarreling and fighting in numbers, I shall decidedly deal with them with the utmost severity of the law. But I cannot bear to punish without warning; therefore, it is right that I should, in incisive (or unmistakable) words, warn you. I trust that the merchants and said people will all be aware of this. You have each of you families, and, while there is yet time, ought to awake to the importance of respecting the law, attending to your business, &c. I very much grieve for the people, and do not shirk earnestly and repeatedly warning them. Do not disobey. A special proclamation."

THE RIOT IN THE FRENCH CONCESSION.

In several of our issues last week, we gave in considerable detail an account of a riot which occurred in the French concession on Sunday, the 3d May, serious in itself, and yet more serious in view of its possible consequences. We have now an opportunity of briefly sketching the circumstances that led up to that outbreak, which will throw needed light on the narrative and documents which we have already published.

To begin at the beginning: There is, and has long been, a native mortuary chapel, known as the "Ningpo Joss-house," near the southwestern extremity of what is now the French concession. It is used as a place where the coffins of natives of Ningpo, who die in Shanghai, are kept till the necessary means have been provided or arrangements made for their removal to be buried in the ancestral burying-grounds of the deceased in their native district. It would also appear that some uninclosed land contiguous to the Joss-house has been used as a place of burial for indigent persons, and is administered by the committee of the Joss-house, which, we believe, is the Ningpo Guild, or some of their number. When the vacant spaces around this were occupied by the allies, who assisted the Chinese against the Taipings in 1861-'62, the grave-mounds, with which it abounded, were leveled, for military reasons. On the retirement of the troops it became a part of the French concession. In 1864 the annual municipal report stated that the executive had at length overcome all the difficulties it had to contend with in settling with the proprietors of the ground that had been covered by graves, and had so arranged matters that only two grave-yards remained—the cemetery of the French marine, and the Ningpo Joss-house. The land-renters' meeting to which this report was submitted was, if we mistake not, presided over by M. Godeaux, then acting consul, now consul-general. The vacant ground was, in 1865, laid out in oblong blocks separated by lines of road marked off by shallow drains, and in 1870 a plan of the concession was engraved, on which the roads were laid down and named. Running along the northeast face of the Joss-house was "Rue de Ningpo," along its southeast face the "Rue de Saigon." So things remained till toward the end of last year, when the council proposed to raise and metal the roads in question, and others contiguous. In January last, a communication (which we have already published—issue of 9th May) was received from the Ningpo Guild, which is the administrator of the Joss-house, and, as it would appear, of some of the lands adjoining. It will be seen that, in language which to those unacquainted with the history of the case must appear very temperate and considerate, they state their objections to the proposed roads being carried out, and offer to build, in close parallelism to them, roads in their stead. From that time to the present, negotiations have been going on; the Taotai, on the one hand, and the consul-general, on the other, being called in to argue the matter. The French council have been unwilling to agree to the proposals of the guild, because a very large part of the concession is built on ground that once was graveyards, and if they once admitted the principle on which the guild base their demand, it might seriously affect the titles of many existing foreign properties. They admitted that the two particular roads in question are of no great public utility, but so important did they feel the principle involved in the claim to be, that, we believe, toward the latter part of the discussion, some such expression as this was used: that, rather than agree to the proposal of the guild, the council would prefer to have the Joss-house removed, and provided with a site elsewhere. This was a very natural expression, as only a year or two ago the cemetery of the French marine (referred to above) was moved to a new situation about a mile west of the cemetery; so that, in suggesting the possibility of the bodies of the deceased Chinese being removed, the council went no further, even in suggestion, than they had already proceeded in fact with the bodies of their own countrymen. It will be noticed that this view of the case is very adroitly ignored by the guild in their plausible document of January. Indeed, it is notorious that nothing has been more common in the history of the foreign settlements in China than the removal of graves by arrangement with the representatives of the deceased. How the present case should be rendered more difficult to deal with, because the ground in dispute outside the Joss-house is the burying-place of beggars, whose removal would lacerate no family ties—which is an argument used by the Daily News—is a kind of logic we fail to understand. But the expression about the removal of the Joss-house was so used by the representatives of the guild that a large amount of popular excitement was at once evoked, it being represented among the people that the council had determined to pull down the Joss-house. About the beginning of last week large crowds began to assemble at and around the Joss-house, and the excitement grew by the mutual contact of suspicious multitudes. The consul-general appears to have all along shown himself strongly disposed to concede the wishes of the guild; which, no doubt, to a large extent accounts for their pertinacity with the council; and at last it was arranged that another meeting between the council and the representatives of the guild should take place on Monday, May 4. It is understood, also, that the council, finding that by the policy of the consul-general the whole odium of upholding what they regarded as the rights of foreigners, in opposition to the claims of the guild, was thrown on them, after much deliberation had privately made up their minds to agree to the proposals of the guild, with some slight modifications. This, however, was not known to the Chinese, and on Saturday the rumor was very prevalent in the concession and northern settlement that there was to be an outbreak on Sunday. It was thought, however, to be mere rumor, and excited no active attention. This will sufficiently show the attitude of the parties concerned up to Sunday forenoon. For subsequent events we refer our readers to the narrative and documents published.

Opinions are divided as to the wisdom of the council's action in its negotiations with the guild. At the same time, we are bound to say here that much of the criticism we have heard adverse to the council appears to us to be based on ignorance of the history, and consequently of the nature, of the question at issue. We are, therefore, glad to hear that there is in preparation a memoir of the whole case based on official records of undoubted validity. Perhaps, however, it may be regarded as a tacit confession that they had erred in judgment; that they should have decided, at the last moment, to concede the demands of the guild. But that conclusion is weighted by the double consideration that the ultimate demands of the guild may have differed materially from those originally made, and that even those last were to be accepted only with modifications. But, while there is this difference of opinion as to the original question, there is a remarkable unanimity among all ranks and nationalities of the foreign community in the opinion that, after the murderous onslaught of Sunday, no question of the rights or claims of the guild should be entertained till a thorough investigation has been made, and justice done according to the issue. As to the ultimate motive and object of the riot, it is difficult to arrive at a clear decision. Some are of opinion that the feelings of the people having been strongly excited, a number of vagabond literati, who abound in every large Chinese town, fostered and fanned it by scandalous reports, and having thus drawn together large crowds on Sunday, incited them to acts of violence, either with the purpose of gratifying their hatred of the French, or for the more sordid purpose of plunder. It will be observed from our narrative that the occurrences of the day give countenance to either of those alternatives. But those acquainted with the tactics of the governing bodies of China are strongly of opinion that the riot was deliberately planned by the guild, and possibly even winked at by the Taotai. How, otherwise, are we to account for the marked manner in which the property of Ningpo men was respected, and the hostility of foreigners in general was deprecated by very scrupulously confining the violence to those who were, or who were supposed to be, French? Indeed, we have the positive statement of a well-informed native that agents were employed by the guild to engage bands of unemployed, rowdies, &c., to raise the riot. The most feasible explanation seems to be that the guild, having in prospect the interview of Monday, thought that a popular demonstration, according to usual Chinese custom, would have a "moral" influence on the decision of council. We have not space now to discuss the justice or injustice of the universal condemnation which the conduct of the French consul-general during and since the outbreak has called forth. We must leave our record of his procedure, which will speak for itself in the meanwhile.

THE NINGPO MEN'S MEMORIAL.

SHANGHAI, January 27, 1874.

To the members of the municipal council, French concession:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, managers of the Ningpo Joss-house grounds, beg leave to bring under your notice the following statement relative to their property situated at the back part of the French concession.

Some time ago the former municipal council proceeded to lay out roads and streets on that part of the concession where the Ningpo guild-property lies, and in doing so have marked out the road on that part of our ground which is very densely packed with coffins containing the remains of deceased Ningpo people. (Red on plan.) To make the road and have a traffic in carriages and vehicles over the remains of the dead is very abhorrent to our ideas, as we do not believe that their spirits would rest in peace; and to disturb their remains by digging them up and carrying them away elsewhere is equally repulsive. The whole of our ground situated at the rear of the concession, around the Joss-house, is very closely filled with the graves of our people of former generations—on the east side of the Joss-house as much as in that part to the west, although it may not appear so, from the ground having been leveled. Previous to the occupation of the Joss-house by the English troops as a barrack the whole of our ground was surrounded and protected by a brick wall, which was partially destroyed by the troops, and the bricks of the remaining portion stolen and carried away. Since then it has lain undisturbed, and as an open field. We have no record, nor are we aware that at any time any part of the Ningpo guild-ground has been surrendered to the public, or to any one on the public behalf, by any written agreement; nor have the guild ever been consulted, so far as we are aware, as to their readiness to part with their lands.

The only time that we know of where we have been asked relative to the matter of roads was about three months ago, or so, when some one from the municipal office called on the man in charge of the Joss-house and asked for a strip of land 13 feet wide, to form one side of the street proposed that runs parallel to the Rue du Consulat. This request was acceded to, and had 13 feet been taken, or even the whole 26 feet, if it had only been off the outside boundary of our land, we would have had nothing to say on that point to-day, as the outside boundary of the land was formerly a creek, and in that line of ground marked C on the accompanying plan we have no dead buried.

We are very desirous to come to some arrangement, if possible, with the municipal council, whereby the proposed new street may be diverted from its present line, and so leave the graves intact. First, we propose that the street may be made to diverge at the point marked D on the chart, and from there run along the outside of our ground, which is over the filled-up creek, till it reaches the Sikaway road. If this proposal is not acceptable, and you have objections to the line of street in consequence of the bend at the point D, and that it does not run in a straight line into the road leading to the creek, then we propose to acquire, from the Tong-shing-dong and other proprietors, a strip of ground 26 feet wide, which will run in a straight line with the outside of our ground, marked S on plan. This we will hand over to the council in place of that now marked out by them; and this, as we propose, will make a straight street for its whole length. And if it is desirable on public behalf to have the streets straight, then what we propose would be better than that now traced out on the ground, as what we would give would make a better junction with the road on the creek side, toward military and naval old cemetery.

To carry out this plan, if you accept of it, we do not anticipate any trouble, as the Tong-shing-dong has no graves in that part of their ground. We are ready and willing to bear all expenses in the purchase of houses and grounds to get a straight street. And we will also recoup the municipal council any moneys that may have been expended in laying out the streets to the present time.

With reference to the street parallel to the Sikaway road, marked G on the plan, it cannot be of utility to the public in any way, as it only gives access to the creek side in toward the concession; but the other street gives the same benefit much more conveniently, while it is of no use leading out toward the west gate, as the right of way stops at the limit of the concession. We think this might be allowed to remain unopened, and that it remain so while the ground is used as a burial-ground.

The ground all around it belongs either to the Ningpo guild or the Tong-shing-dong, and neither of the societies have any will or desire to use their grounds for any other purpose than they are now used for. The Ningpo people will not allow, if they can help it, their ground to be built upon, while they have had it confirmed to them as cemetery-grounds by various acts of the French authorities.

While laying these statements and proposals before you, we beg to remark that it is not from any desire to cause trouble that we act in this manner, but simply that the graves in our former cemetery may not be desecrated, and that the bones of our ancestors may remain undisturbed. This feeling on our part you may understand, as we believe it is one not uncommon to foreigners in regard to the graves of their dead.

Trusting you will give the foregoing your kind and favorable consideration, so that an amicable agreement may be come to.

Waiting the favor of your reply, we remain, gentlemen, your obedient servants, &c

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, May 23, 1874.

SIR: I beg you to accept my best thanks for your dispatch No. 362, of the 11th instant, giving an account of the riot in the French settlement on the 3d instant, and your proceedings in aiding to quell it, with sundry details of the course of events on that occasion. The fullness of the report seems to leave nothing to be desired to understand what was done; and I am sure that you deserve the hearty thanks of your countrymen, and of the community generally, for your promptness in ascertaining the existence and efficient aid in suppressing the violence of the mob. It is a matter for thankfulness that no more lives were lost or property burned.

I beg you to present my sincere thanks to the commanders of the United States steamers Ashuelot and Yantic, and through them to the officers and crews, for the willing aid rendered by landing detachments as soon as you requested it. The presence of this trained body of armed men had, I cannot doubt, a powerful effect in restraining the mob from attempting any further violence.

I cannot now answer fully your request for directions as to the course to be taken in regard to the losses incurred by our countrymen. The question of the responsibility for the riot is rather a complicated one, and its answer demands more knowledge on one or two points than I now possess. I think, however, that it is safe to say that if the whole foreign community at the port of Shanghai had been under one council, no trouble would have arisen in respect to the arrangement of this dispute about the graves. However that may be, I wish you would give me some particulars of the various claims for damages suffered by American citizens.

I am, sir, &c.,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 27, 1874.

SIR: Herewith I inclose a copy of "An act relating to Ambassadors, Consuls, and other officers," approved on the 17th instant, and invite your attention to that part thereof relative to recommendations by diplomatic officers of the United States, of citizens of the same, to positions of trust or profit under the government of the country in which they are located, without the consent of the Secretary of State being previously obtained.

You are consequently instructed, whenever, in your opinion, the interests of this Government will be promoted by the appointment of Americans to office in China, to make such recommendations relating thereto as you may deem proper. You will, however, be expected to report each case to the Department.

I am, &c.,

AN ACT relating to Ambassadors, Consuls and other officers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That no Ambassador, Envoy Extraordinary, Minister Plenipotentiary, Minister Resident, Commissioner to any foreign country, chargé d'affaires, Secretary of Legation, Assistant Secretary of Legation, Interpreter to any legation in any foreign country, Consul General, Consul, Commercial Agent, consular pupils, or consular agent shall be absent from his post or the performance of his duties for a longer period than ten days at any one time, without the permission previously obtained of the President. And no compensation shall be allowed for the time of any such absence in any case except in cases of sickness; nor shall any diplomatic or consular officer correspond in regard to the public affairs of any foreign government with any private person, newspaper, or other periodical, or otherwise than with the proper officers of the United States; nor, without the consent of the Secretary of State previously obtained, recommend any person at home or abroad for any employment of trust or profit under the government of the country in which he is located; nor ask or accept, for himself or any other person, any present, emolument, pecuniary favor, office, or title of any kind from any such government.

No. 44.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 7, 1874. (Received September 1.)

SIR: I have the honor to send you the documents and reports (inclosures 1 to 12) connected with the recent trial at Chefoo, growing out of the attack made by the people of Chi-mi on an American missionary, Rev. H. Corbett, residing there. I have not heretofore sent you any of the papers connected with this affair, since at no time was it possible to indicate the result; and you have now the whole story. Mr. Sheppard's report (inclosure 8) furnishes so full an account of the origin, progress, and results of the disturbance, and of the steps taken to induce the intendant at Chefoo to bring the offenders to justice, with the details of their trial and punishment, and subsequent indemnity for Mr. Corbett's losses, and his return to Chi-mi, that I shall not attempt to add anything to it.

As soon as the leading particulars of the assault were received from Mr. Corbett, (inclosure 1,) Mr. Cornabé, our consular agent at Chefoo, made them known to the intendant, (or taotai, as he is usually called by foreigners,) and continued to give him the subsequent details of outrages suffered by the native Christians, at Chi-mi, urging him to uphold law and order by the arrest and punishment of the guilty. I inclose only one of his replies, (inclosure 4,) for the whole correspondence will not interest you; and this specimen is enough to show the manner in which the simplest statements can be misrepresented when it serves the end of the officials to shirk their duty. The most noticeable thing in it is the charge brought against the convert Wang Li-tung, of an attempt to kidnap a child for the Roman Catholic Church; but this allegation was so barefaced and unfounded that it was not even referred to on the trial, much less attempted to be proved against him, as soon as it was found that he was a Protestant. Nothing of this kind had ever been done in that region, and the local officials trumped up the charge, most probably because it would be readily believed elsewhere.

As soon as the report of these things reached me, six weeks after their date, (for our communication with Chefoo is slow in winter,) I brought it to the notice of the foreign office, which immediately sent a copy of my complaint to the governor of Shan-tung. (Inclosure 2.) As soon as more precise details were received, I also desired Mr. Sheppard to take charge of the case, which, it was plain, would require much patience and decision to bring to a satisfactory end. (Inclosure 7.) At the first interview which they had, the intendant evidently looked upon the affair as having no serious importance—probably, among other reasons, because there was no loss of life—and wished to regard it as already in effect settled. (Inclosure 8.) This being the case, and full evidence of his disinclination to uphold the treaty being received, I again brought the affair to the notice of the foreign office, urging that there was no reason for this tardy action; and received a reply that he would be told to attend to its adjudication, which was immediately done, as he himself acknowledges in his subsequent report. (Inclosures 5 and 6.)

This report of the intendant is an interesting document when read in connection with his reply of February 7 to Mr. Cornabé and Mr. Sheppard's dispatch. In it he undertakes to explain away, or else admits, every charge which he at first declared was unfounded. The previous portion of that correspondence had probably been sent to his superiors, and it was now necessary to exhibit a degree of diligence in maintaining the peace in Chi-mi, by proving the falsity of some charges which were never made. His proclamation (inclosure 9) will be regarded with some respect for a time, and the native Christians can appeal to it as upholding their right to adopt a faith so different from most of their countrymen. Since Mr. Corbett's return, though he himself is treated with respect, it is reported that his brethren still suffer contumely and are shunned, but nothing worse than hard words seems to have yet been experienced.

One thing is observable in this trial. No evil conduct was charged against the native Christians by their countrymen, and no excuse was offered by them for cutting down their fruit-trees, robbing their houses, or assaulting and wounding them, except that they were followers of a foreign faith. A testimony of this kind to their blameless living can hardly fail to have a beneficial effect in that region, and the report of these things in other parts of Shan-tung will perhaps tend to restrain future outbreaks. The circulation of news is not very rapid in the inland parts of the province, especially among the agricultural and laboring classes; but the notoriety of the trial, and the willingness of the intendant to do justice in punishing his guilty countryman for acts done to a foreigner, will, it may be hoped, give this an exceptional influence for good.

Another thing may also be referred to. The intendant is very careful in his report (inclosure 11) to particularize certain charges of ill-usage suffered by converts at Chi-mi, contained in Mr. Cornabé's letters to him, and to state that they had all been ruled out of court as not being under its jurisdiction, adding that this was done with the full consent of the United States consul. He alludes to this right of the Chinese government to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over its own subjects, in the proclamation issued to be posted in Chi-mi; and it is a point on which the authorities are becoming more and more sensitive, especially in reference to missionary operations. In that proclamation he quotes the twenty-ninth article of the treaty, and then sets forth most distinctly the independent jurisdiction of each nation over its own subjects. This distinction appears easy enough in theory, but even some of our best-informed countrymen appear to have come to the conclusion that because the article says that those who peaceably teach and practice Christianity shall not be molested, it involves the right to compel the Chinese to take up the cudgels when their own people are molested for professing Christianity.

The result which has been attained in this trial is owing mainly to the decision and perseverance of Mr. Sheppard in asking only for the rights guaranteed by the treaty, and convincing the intendant that he must maintain them and punish the guilty before the case would be dropped. He was materially assisted by the missionaries at Chefoo in translating and interpreting, and the list of the men concerned in the attacks on Mr. Corbett furnished by the native converts, with their evidence of the part each one took in the acts of violence, was of material advantage in fixing the guilt on the right persons. I would respectfully suggest that Mr. Sheppard's action in this case may receive your special approval.

Statement of Rev. H. Corbett.

DECEMBER 22, 1873.

On the 1st of December, as I was passing through the market-town of Hwa-yin, about forty li south of the city of Chi-mi, I was followed by a crowd of men attending the theatre there, who attacked me with stones, crying out at the same time "Hit him," "hit him;" and "Kill him," "kill him." Returning in the evening, and passing by the same place, the crowd rushed forward to meet me, fully occupying the road on both sides, and leaving but a narrow passage for me in the middle. When I came up to them

I saw that several of the men had stones in their hands, which they threw at me, hitting me in several places and injuring also my horse. I urged my horse forward with all possible speed, but the men pursued me quite outside the town. On the following day I went with my passport to the local magistrate, stating the above facts. He promised to investigate the matter, and that he would see to it that I had no further difficulty in the future. On the second day he issued a proclamation for the purpose of restraining the people, which he sent to me to read. The proclamation stated that foreigners had a perfect right, according to the treaty, to propagate their religion in the interior. In it the district magistrate also stated that he had received special instructions from his superior officer to afford protection to all persons propagating their religion according to the treaty. On the same day I went to the town of Hwa-yin, and learned that the proclamation had not been posted. I then wrote to the magistrate informing him of this fact, and begging that he would attend to this matter immediately, for fear that by being neglected it would grow worse, and stating that there were other villagers who had formerly received me cordially who did not now dare to hold intercourse with me. In consequence of this several proclamations were posted in different places, the magistrate thus far fulfilling his promises, but failing to apprehend or punish any one. Yesterday, on the 19th of the month, I, with several native Christians, went to the yuh-hwang temple fair, which is about thirty li south of the city. On approaching the place a great many men ran to meet us. There was such a crowd and uproar that I did not attempt to preach or distribute books, but only endeavored to conciliate and quiet the people. I was suddenly attacked again on all sides with stones, by which I was struck several times. I then ran into the temple to escape from danger. The crowd rushed in after me, filling the temple and the court, and stones were hurled at me from all directions, both inside and outside. While I was in the temple for a few moments, thinking how I could best escape, the mob only increased, and I determined to run the risk of forcing my way, if possible, through the people. As I rushed out the people followed me in crowds, but fortunately for me a few men behind me fell down, thus blocking up the way for a moment and giving me barely time to mount my horse and gallop off. The people followed, pelting me with stones and clods of earth; some of the native Christians seized hold of a few of the leaders, restraining them for an instant, thus further facilitating my escape. I urged on my horse and got out of the way, followed by a shower of stones. After my escape the people sought out and fell to beating the native Christians. One old man was severely wounded by a stone, so that he could not walk, and was carried to the house of a friend to have his wounds attended to, being unable to get to his home, though it was not far off. Another person was knocked down by a stone, which cut a large gash on his head. Others received wounds more or less severe. The people continued in a state of lawlessness, and there is reason to fear that the mere issuing of proclamations will be insufficient to restore order.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, February 6, 1874.

SIRS: I have heard it reported that Mr. Corbett, an American missionary, who had been desired by the Christians of Chi-mi, in Shantung, to come and preach to them, and had lived there quietly for some months without any difficulty arising, teaching the converts at their request the doctrines of the Scriptures, suddenly became the object of the suspicions of the people. In December, hearing that several hundred reckless men were out against him, and being aware of it, he escaped with his children and got away; but the riotous people then surrounded and burst into his house, destroying his books and things utterly. Mr. Corbett happily reached Chefoo without suffering any violence himself.

As this case is one which, if not thoroughly investigated, will, it is to be feared, grow into something very serious, I make it known to your excellencies, with the hope that orders may be sent to the proper authorities in Shantung to fully inquire into and learn the causes of this disturbance in that region, with the grounds of the popular suspicion, so that the affair may be equitably judged and settled. This is highly important.

I avail myself of this occasion to wish your excellencies the highest happiness.

TUNGCHI, 13th year, 1st moon, 8th day, (February 24, 1874.

The members of the foreign office return their compliments.

Your excellency's note, giving the report respecting an American missionary at Chi-mi in Shantung, has been received, in which you state that in December last several hundreds of reckless men were out against him, but being aware of it he escaped with his children, while his house was afterward surrounded and broken into, and his books and things utterly destroyed.

We have now to state that orders have been sent to the governor of Shantung to direct that a thorough investigation be made into this affair, with a view to its equitable adjudication and settlement; and when his report of the proceedings taken is received, we will have the honor of again addressing you and making known what has been done.

With the present reply we take the opportunity of wishing you every happiness.

The Taotai to W. A. Cornabé, United States vice-consul.

FEBRUARY 7, 1874.

The day after starting for the provincial capital, on public business, I had the honor to receive your dispatch, stating that you had been informed by the Rev. H. Corbett that the people of Chi-mi had collected a mob and assaulted him, and requesting me to inquire into the matter. I also received your letter stating that he had further informed you that the people there had collected 300 men for the purpose of injuring him, and had also carried off his donkey, &c.

While I was purposing to investigate this affair, I received the report of the magistrate of Chi-mi, stating "that on the 1st December, at the market-town of Hwa-yin, during a theatrical play, a native named Wang Li-tung, there present, in front of the Yuh-hwang temple, seized a child of thirteen years, called Li-San-man, crying out that he wished to take it to the Tien-chu-tang (Roman Catholic church) to enter the faith. The child screamed, and the crowd at the theater, moved by a common resentment, rescued it. Wang Li-tung then proceeded to drag from the ground a man called Kiang Kwan-kih, but the crowd rushed forward and pursued him, while he, leading on a number of men, resorted to violence. Fortunately the men at the theater were many, and succeeded in reclaiming also Kiang Kwan-kih." Thus this native Chinese dares in open day to kidnap children, and then requests that the matter be investigated. (Original obscure.) I suppose that this affair is the one referred to in your dispatch. What a discrepancy between these two representations!

When foreign missionaries propagate their doctrines in the interior, their intercourse with the natives should be peaceable, and friendly relations be maintained. In the present affair it is evident that both parties were to blame, and each of them has told its partial story, hoping that it would be believed. Seeing that it concerns the intercourse between this and foreign nations, we must carefully discriminate between the false and the true, and follow up the matter (to a settlement) so as to insure peace in future.

On my departure from Chefoo I designated Wang Shin-jin, an expectant prefect, to go at once to Chi-mi, and, in connection with the magistrate, examine the matter and report to me. On my return to Lai-chau he reported to me that the origin of this affray was really found to be this: A great many people were assembled at the theater, and Mr. Corbett brought his three children to enjoy themselves there. The people were not familiar with the sight of foreign children, and gathered around to look at them, which Mr. Corbett opposed by sharply rebuking them. In consequence of this the crowd increased, and he took his children and left. There was certainly no such thing as attacking and stoning him.

It was simply that the convert Wang Li-tung seized hold of a child at the theater, named Li San-man, and was carrying him off, as he said, to have him join the church.

The child screamed and resisted, but Wang, holding it firmly, was running away, when the people at the theater, moved by a common indignation, rushed forward and rescued it. Wang then led on a company of men and began to fight; both sides refused to yield, and men received wounds from each other.

In regard to a mob gathering at Chi-mi, it was because the people were incensed by seeing Wang Li-tung trying to force people to enter the religion, and came to the city to institute a suit and stop such proceedings. This affair occurred when many candidates were gathered for the examination; but beside this, there was no other assemblage of the people.

In regard to Sü Yin-tsoh going to Ko-fau and carrying off a cow and an ass, I learned that Mr. Corbett had a house there, and when he returned to Chefoo he left these animals and sundry articles in charge of an assistant named Lin Lung-méi. Many people in the neighborhood, hearing of this attempt at forcible proselytizing, went to Mr. Corbett's house to inquire into the matter; but really, his goods were none of them carried off. His cow and ass broke the ropes which held them and ran away to the hills, seeking for food, but there was no such thing as leading them away. The magistrate had them found and brought back, and delivered to Lin. These things can all be proved by evidence. Just now there is no gathering among the people to create disturbance.

In looking at this whole affair (says the Taotai) in reference to foreigners going into the interior to propagate Christianity, it is well understood that those who preach it and those who adopt it are to receive the same protection as other people, but no permission can be given them to force others to enter it. Now, when Wang Li-tung violently dragged away this child he began an incipient rebellion—a thing much to be detested; and such village brawls cannot be allowed to extend. All the parties concerned in this affair ought to be summoned before the magistrate for a thorough judicial investigation and settlement.

On my return (to Chefoo) I directed the same Wang Shin-jin to return to Chi-mi and make known these instructions. I am informed that the people there desire to settle this matter, and that when Mr. Corbett comes back they will treat him in the most friendly manner; no similar disturbance shall again arise, and they beg that further judicial proceedings may be stayed. In the disturbance which arose at the theater, it appears that no man took the lead; and it would be difficult to summon the real persons (who caused it.) Much of what is reported is false. Since there is a willingness to settle the affair and resume friendly relations, it is advisable to stop all litigation. This would be of advantage to the missionaries.

I therefore make this reply; and if my proposal pleases you, may I ask you to summon Mr. Corbett, and instruct him in future to earnestly enjoin upon all who are connected with him that they will not be allowed to create such disturbances in future? In conducting law-cases in the interior, private interference (on the missionary's part) will not be allowed.

I shall issue a stringent proclamation, informing the people of that district that they will not be allowed again to show disrespect to missionaries, but must seek for lasting peace, stop their litigations, and be sincerely friendly.

In respect to Mr. Corbett's complaint that trees have been cut down at Pan-hien, and other outrages committed at Ta-lao village and Tung-kia-ngan, I have directed the district magistrate to make inquiries and report, but have not yet heard from him. It is probable that mutual distrust and misunderstanding have arisen from these false rumors. If this affair be soon settled, the minds of people in other places will be quieted.

With this reply, I take the opportunity to wish you the compliments of the season.

Mr. Williams to the ministers of the foreign office.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, April 4, 1874.

SIRS: I have already brought to your notice the attack on Rev. H. Corbett by the people of Chi-mi, who stoned and robbed him, and then received a reply stating that orders had been sent to the governor of Shantung to examine into the affair.

I have since received a report from the American consul at Che Foo, who has been investigating this case with the intendant there, in which he complains that the latter is dilatory, and is trying to slur over the whole affair of the attack and robbery of Mr. Corbett. His report leads me to ask why the intendant should delay the case three whole months, and then just turn around and say that he had finished it? It is not easy to explain this, except by supposing that he is partial in some way. If he will examine the 11th article of the treaty he will see what is required to be done, and that his report of the facts is entirely at variance with what the consul has ascertained. The names of more than ten men, who were engaged in the robbery, have been given in with the evidence, and yet he avers that the case is already finished. I think this shows clearly that he is unwilling to try it at all.

I therefore earnestly request that other orders may be sent to Shantung requiring the governor to direct his subordinates to have this whole matter tried in Chefoo, to which place the criminals, and all that are connected with it, shall be removed, and where the intendant shall summon the witnesses. Here, in conjunction with the consul, it can be fully examined and decided in accordance with equity and the criminals punished. It will not be difficult, under such circumstances, to get at the truth; for, as the proverb says, "when the water has fallen the rocks appear."

As I write this note I improve the opportunity to wish you every happiness.

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

Ministers of foreign office to Mr. Williams.

TUNGCHI, 13th year, 2d moon, 26 day, (April 12, 1874.)

The ministers of the foreign office return their compliments.

We have received your excellency's note respecting the robbery of Mr. Corbett. [Here follow its leading points, and a summary of what their former note contained.]

We have now, in compliance with your request, again urged the governor of Shantung to enjoin upon his subordinate immediately to examine this affair in accordance with justice, and punish the wrong-doers, and report the conclusion as soon as possible; and now send this note in reply for your information.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, March 11, 1874.

SIR: I have received three dispatches from Mr. A. Cornabé, United States vice-consul at Chefoo, dated 12th January, 28th February, and 2d March, all of them relating to the attack on Rev. H. Corbett, at Chi-mi, on the southern side of Shantung promontory, and detailing the action he had taken in procuring redress for this violence, and compensation for the property destroyed; he also incloses copies of the communications which have passed between him and the Taotai upon this matter, from which it is plain that the latter is disinclined to prosecute the affair to a satisfactory conclusion.

Under these circumstances I wish you would proceed to Chefoo and see what further steps can be taken to bring the affair to a conclusion according to the obligations of the treaty and justice. It seems from the papers here that the messenger sent to Chi-mi from Chefoo, and the district magistrate of that place, have given in statements to their superiors of the affair which are plainly distorted and imperfect, and designed to shield him from all culpability.

You will therefore find it necessary to get the evidence of the persons best acquainted with all the circumstances of the affair, so as to counteract these ex-parte reports. In asking for redress, the arrest and punishment of the ringleaders should be demanded, as well for the future security of foreigners going there, as for the maintenance of order. A careful list of the property should be made out which was stolen or destroyed, with its actual value, and compensation made to Mr. Corbett for his losses. When these two points are obtained, the district magistrate may well be made to issue a proclamation setting forth the freedom guaranteed to Christians and their teachers by treaty and imperial decree, to practice their faith without molestation.

I do not think it best for you to ask for any compensation for the losses of the native Christians, and it will probably be best to limit your action to that which concerns Mr. Corbett alone, and let the redress which may be given to him be admonition enough for the security it may afford to his native converts. They cannot fail to be benefited if his wrongs are redressed, and we have no such liberty of action in this respect that we can properly interfere in any direct way for native Chinese, and it is better to say nothing.

In regard to this case, it seems, from what I now know, that this popular rising was of such dimensions as to alarm the district magistrate, who told Mr. Corbett that he could not protect him, as the power in his hands was too weak. There was no direct attack on Mr. Corbett, who, escaping by night with his children, happily avoided the violence of the mob, which vented itself on his rooms. It will be difficult, perhaps, in such a case to fix the guilt on any individual. It is a question to be decided by the evidence whether the district magistrate did what he could to warn or protect him; but he seems not to have been altogether silent and not at all inimical. The violence of a Chinese mob soon gets beyond the control of their local officials, and it is a question for us to consider how much this point is to be weighed in this case, and what degree of protection we are to expect. The case at Chi-mi differs from that at Yu-chan, in December, 1871, when Mr. Pierson was attacked, in that the latter was a simple assault with robbery, in which the populace sympathized very little.

I hope you will succeed in attaining the object for which you go to Che Foo. The further action of Mr. Corbett must depend on himself in a manner, but no force can be regularly employed to protect an American anywhere in the interior.

I have, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

Mr. Sheppard to Mr. Williams.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Tien-tsin, June 25, 1874.

SIR: It affords me much pleasure to be able now to report to you the final and most satisfactory settlement of the serious disturbance, or succession of riots, which occurred last December in the district of Chi-mi, province of Shantung, and originated in a feeling of hostility stirred up among the people of that district by evil-disposed persons against an American missionary who had been peaceably living and quietly pursuing his calling in their midst. This outbreak against missionaries is the first of a serious nature that has happened in the north of China since the massacre of French missionaries at Tien-tsin, in 1870, and it is the only organized disturbance that has occurred in the interior, far from a treaty-port, since the attack made upon missionaries at Yang-chow, in 1868.

The history of this case seems, therefore, in my opinion, interesting from several points of view. In the first place, it serves as an indication of the progress of public opinion regarding the labors of Christian missionaries in this country, since the previous disturbances above referred to; it shows the peculiar causes which continue to affect the peaceable residence of foreigners in the interior, and the jeopardy their lives may be placed in at any hour; it also shows to what extent the treaties existing between China and other nations are known and respected in the country at large; and, lastly, the record of this case exhibits the attitude generally assumed by Chinese officials, at the treaty-ports and in the interior, when called upon to administer justice in behalf of foreigners, whether it be asked under the treaties, or under the plainest requirements of Chinese law.

The following brief summary of the voluminous documents composing the record of this case will explain the origin, nature, and consequences of the outbreak, as well as the course of action I pursued, and the results attained by that course. About the 1st of September, 1873, the Rev. Hunter Corbett, an American missionary residing in Che Foo, left that place, accompanied by his three children, and went to the district of Chi-mi, on the sea-coast of Shantung, about four hundred li (one hundred and thirty miles) south of Chefoo, for the purpose of residing temporarily among the native Christians of that district, in response to their earnest solicitations. He was provided with a passport, as required by treaty, bearing the seals of the consular and Chinese authorities of Chefoo. He took up his residence in the village of Ko-fau, twenty-five li from the city of Chi-mi; and besides the native converts, numbering one hundred and fifty adults, Mr. Corbett found a large number of people in his vicinity desirous of professing the Christian faith.

It was Mr. Corbett's practice to move about among the neighboring villages, in company with his native helpers, preaching and distributing religious books to the people; and on such occasions the people had been found, with few exceptions, friendly and well disposed. It was not until the 30th of November that any active hostility was shown; but on that day, as Mr. Corbett was passing through the village of Hwa-yin, on his way to preach at a more distant place, a crowd of people, who had been witnessing a theatrical performance, assailed Mr. Corbett with stones and threatening language. Still later in the day, as Mr. Corbett was passing through the same village on his return home, he was still more violently attacked by the same people, who had remained in waiting for him. Mr. Corbett, being on horseback, made his escape in safety, and the next day he complained to the district magistrate of Chi-mi, and asked for protection under his passport, in accordance with the treaty. The magistrate promised to protect Mr. Corbett and to punish those guilty of the assault; he also showed Mr. Corbett a draught of a proclamation he proposed to issue, asserting the right accorded to missionaries by the treaty to propagate religion, and the protection to be extended to native converts as well. But none of these promises were fulfilled; and it was not until Mr. Corbett had several days afterward again begged the magistrate to take action that the latter expressed his sense of duty in this matter by simply issuing the proclamation. The inevitable consequences of such official inaction in this country soon followed.

On the 17th of December Mr. Corbett went with some native converts to preach and distribute books at a fair held in the Yuh-hwang temple, thirty li south of the city of Chi-mi. On reaching the temple he was soon surrounded by an immense mob hooting and throwing stones. Nothing that Mr. Corbett and the native Christians could do or say would pacify the raging crowd, who appeared to be bent on some bloody work. Mr. Corbett took refuge in the temple, but there his position became more precarious every moment. The mob surrounded the building, filled the courts, and showered stones into the room where he was, one of the stones striking him in the face. Seeing no way of escape, at the peril of his life, and with the assistance of a few native Christians, who nobly stood forth to defend him, he attempted to force his way through the midst of the mob, and barely succeeded in doing so. He mounted his horse and galloped off amid a shower of missiles, and with the crowd in full cry after him, but he managed to make good his escape. Disappointed of their victim, the mob then fell upon the Christians who had been left behind, beating all of them and inflicting severe wounds upon some, who had to be carried to their homes. The passions of the people were now thoroughly roused, and the excitement had spread over the whole district. A crisis was approaching, which might have been averted by the display of firmness and energy on the part of the magistrate in the discharge of his duty. But his conduct was precisely similar to that of the officials during the corresponding stage of the Yang-chow affair in 1868, and of the Tien-tsin massacre in 1870; he was actuated by no motive to sustain treaty rights, nor even, as it appeared, by the common humanity of coming promptly forward with such protection as he could give to life and property imperiled by mob violence.

When Mr. Corbett the same day reached his home at Ko-fau he at once reported this fresh disturbance to the district magistrate, naming some of the ringleaders of the mob, and urging that immediate action be taken to arrest the guilty and restore order. Meanwhile it became plainly apparent to Mr. Corbett and his native friends that more mischief was brewing, the excitement and commotion in the neighborhood finally reaching such a degree as to lead the native Christians to urge Mr. Corbett to fly from the place. On the night of December 19, fully convinced of the danger of remaining where he was, Mr. Corbett, with his three children, fled to the district city of Chi-mi, distant twenty-five li, escorted by a small band of undaunted native Christians. On the 21st of December Mr. Corbett obtained an interview with the magistrate, who gravely said that the disturbance had now become too serious for him to manage, and he could not answer for his own safety, let alone the safety of foreigners. The magistrate repeatedly pressed Mr. Corbett to fly to Chefoo, and promised to restore order after his departure. Mr. Corbett wisely determined to continue his flight, and, accordingly, late in the night of the 21st December, he left with his children for Chefoo, and, traveling by a circuitous route, reached there in safety.

The news of Mr. Corbett's escape, when it became known the next morning, was the signal for a general uprising. Armed mobs assembled with impunity and in great numbers. They were exultant in having succeeded in disposing of the foreigner, with the apparent approval of the magistrate, and they proceeded first to wreak their vengeance on all that Mr. Corbett had left behind. They broke into and demolished the interior of his house, destroyed or carried off his furniture and personal effects, and took away his mule and cow. A pack-mule, loaded with some of Mr. Corbett's effects, was stopped on the road by a mob and forcibly taken away from the man in charge.

Then commenced a relentless persecution of the native Christians, and every day witnessed scenes of violence, pillage, and ruthless destruction of property. Fruit-trees were destroyed, farming implements and stock carried away, and houses stripped of their furniture. Two Christians were bound and carried off; another Christian was severely wounded by a weapon in the hands of a local constable, who was leading a mob into his house; and many Christians fled from their homes to places of concealment. The village of Tung-chia-au-tsz was wholly abandoned by its inhabitants, who, being all Christians, fled from the attack of a mob. Fortunately no lives were lost, for, after Mr. Corbett's escape, the rioters seemed to be more intent upon persecution and pillage than the shedding of blood. A mob of about 3,000 men assembled in the suburbs of the city and were becoming turbulent, when the magistrate hurried to the spot, and upon his hearing and promising to consider their charges against the "foreign devil," the mob gradually dispersed. A mob also collected in front of the inn where

Mr. Corbett stopped while in the city of Chi-mi. Threats and imprecations against foreigners, native converts, and the Christian religion were heard on every side, indicating a popular feeling of hostility.

Such was the course of events in the district of Chi-mi during the month of December. Subsequent investigations proved that the hostility of the people was aroused and their passions inflamed by the accusations so long and so falsely made against foreign missionaries in China. Any falsehood that can be invented to defame the foreigner and render him hateful finds ready believers among the ignorant mass of Chinese; and there were not wanting in Chi-mi designing persons to thus fan the flame of excitement, when once it was aroused. The old story of kidnapping children for mutilation was revived; but undoubtedly the hatred displayed against Christian preachers and converts was mainly due to the general belief in the truth of such vile and abominable charges as are made against the Christian religion in the native pamphlet known as the "Death-blow to corrupt doctrines." This pamphlet, it appears, was widely circulated throughout the district of Chi-mi some time ago by influential men among the literati, and many assert that its distribution was encouraged by the local officials themselves; it is certain at least that they did not attempt to check it.

In this affair the culpability of the district magistrate seemed unquestionable. From the 30th November, when the first disturbance occurred, he never attempted to make a single arrest, or administer the slightest punishment. This indifference was readily enough construed into sympathy with the rioters, and hence the latter were emboldened to continue their lawlessness. In the mean time Mr. Corbett had not neglected to report the disturbance to the consular authority at Chefoo. Mr. Cornabé, the United States consular agent, first wrote to the customs Taotai, at Chefoo, on the 22d of December, giving an account of the attack made upon Mr. Corbett at the Yuh-hwang temple on the 17th of December, and the disorder it had occasioned in the district, and earnestly requesting the taotai to urge the magistrate of Chi-mi to apprehend and punish the guilty. The Taotai replied briefly, expressing his disbelief in Mr. Corbett's account, and stating that he would have the Chi-mi magistrate investigate the matter and report. A few days later Mr. Corbett arrived in Chefoo, and Mr. Cornabé was then enabled to furnish the taotai with fuller particulars, and with the names of some of the principal rioters.

About this time the Taotai left Chefoo on a short visit to the provincial capital, and before leaving he sent a deputy official to Chi-mi to assist the magistrate in his investigation. During the taotai's absence Mr. Cornabé repeatedly wrote to him, giving further details of the disturbance, as they came to hand, and earnestly desiring him to send such instructions as would call forth honest exertions on the part of the magistrate.

At length, on the 7th of February, the taotai replied in a long dispatch. He had received the reports of the deputy and the magistrate, and they agreed in representing that no such disturbance as Mr. Corbett complained of had occurred at Chi-mi. The taotai, following the reports of his subordinates, positively denied that Mr. Corbett had been attacked, and made a rambling statement, accusing a native Christian of attempting to kidnap a child, thus causing a disturbance at the Yuh-hwang temple; and taking all this for granted, he considered that any disorder which might have existed was brought about by the indiscretion of Mr. Corbett and the native converts, hence he desired that Mr. Corbett should be admonished to avoid giving offense in future. But the taotai betrayed his real feelings by urging that judicial proceedings should be stayed, as the people of Chi-mi were now anxious to settle their differences and live in peace with Mr. Corbett. Mr. Cornabé replied to this dispatch, refuting its misrepresentations, and asking, once for all, that an impartial investigation should be made, and that the principal rioters, whose names he had given, should be arrested and punished. The taotai answered by simply saying that he would again send a deputy to Chi-mi.

It was evident that the taotai was bent upon shielding the fault of the magistrate, and avoiding his unpleasant duty of redressing the wrongs of a foreigner, as required by treaty.

On the 7th of March, when navigation re-opened at this port, I received from Mr. Cornabé a dispatch setting forth the occurrences related above, and informing me that notwithstanding his repeated efforts he had been unable to obtain the least satisfaction from the Taotai, or even the admission of any wrong in this matter, and he therefore requested instructions for his guidance. Impressed by the serious aspect this case had now assumed, involving, as it did, the integrity of important treaty stipulations, and fully believing that the future security of foreigners and native Christians in the interior of Shantung was now at stake, and would be seriously affected for better or worse by the manner of adjusting this difficulty, I determined to go myself to Chefoo, and endeavor to bring about a settlement with the Taotai. With your approval I therefore proceeded to Chefoo without delay, where I employed myself for a few days after my arrival in collecting testimony from native Christians and others who had come from Chi-mi; and this business having been completed, with the result of fully substantiating Mr. Corbett's statements, I called upon the Taotai on the 24th of March.

From the inclosed memorandum of our interview it will be seen that the Taotai was in no humor to discuss the business fairly. He first threw the blame entirely upon the native Christians, then upon Mr. Corbett, and finally insisted that proceedings should be stopped, as the people of Chi-mi were now anxious to be at peace with Mr. Corbett. He attributed the disturbance to an attempt made by a native Christian to kidnap a child. When I came to demand the arrest and trial of forty-two principal rioters, whose names had been given, the taotai emphatically refused to comply, and it was only after I had as firmly insisted upon his doing so, in observance of article 11 of our treaty, that he at length yielded his reluctant consent, but not, however, until I had been obliged to say that, failing in his arresting these men, I would consider the question of arresting them myself by virtue of the power given to United States authorities in the last clause of article 11 of the United States treaty. This was the first important step toward a satisfactory adjustment, and it was taken by the Taotai only after he had been obliged to abandon every one of the numerous false positions he had assumed in argument. After I had corrected his frequent misstatements as to occurrences at Chi-mi, I had still to convince him that it was his duty to afford redress under the treaty, and he would not be convinced of this until he had found and read for himself the various clauses I had referred to. Our discussion may be characterized as a stubborn attempt on the part of the taotai to make light of a serious matter and ignore his lawful responsibility, and an equally stubborn adherence on my part to rights which have been long established by treaty.

A month passed before I was informed by the taotai, through Mr. Cornabé, that the accused had been brought to Chefoo. I at once went to Chefoo, and upon my arrival there, on May 1, I addressed the Taotai, asking for a list of the names of those brought for trial. On receiving the taotai's reply I was surprised and disappointed to find that of the forty-two whose names I had handed to the taotai on the 24th of March, all of whom he had repeatedly promised to arrest, only ten had now been brought to Chefoo, besides four others who had not been accused.

This breach of good faith, after a month's delay, was part of a temporizing policy to which I was determined not to submit. I could not consent to go to trial with but ten of the accused, without failing to obtain adequate and lasting redress for the outrage committed, and my desire was to impress the people of Chi-mi with the fact that such lawless proceedings as had occurred in their district would not be passed over lightly.

Accordingly, on May 4, I called upon the taotai, accompanied by Mr. Cornabé and Commander Bridgeman, of the United States gunboat Palos, which vessel had been sent to Chefoo from Shanghai by Mr. Seward, who considerably anticipated my need of such support as the mere presence of a gunboat could afford in the settlement of this question.

The taotai was attended by the magistrate of Chi-mi and the magistrate of Fuh-shan, the district in which Chefoo is situated. The appearance and conduct of the Chi-mi magistrate confirmed the opinion previously formed of his character. He was an elderly man, infirm and irresolute, and apparently without spirit or ability. The Fuh-shan magistrate seemed intelligent and energetic.

A memorandum of the interview is inclosed herewith. I first reproached the Taotai with some warmth for his bad faith, whereupon he made several lame attempts to excuse his delinquency, but only succeeded in exposing, in a still worse light, the utter inefficiency of the Chi-mi magistrate, who had, as the Taotai unintentionally proved, quite disregarded his instructions. The earnestness with which I urged my views seemed to convince the Taotai of the propriety of doing his duty and fulfilling his promises; and so, after some further quibbling, he declared himself willing to complete the arrests and bring all the accused to Chefoo for trial. He deputed the Fuh-shan magistrate to carry out this business, and agreed to my proposal that two weeks should be allowed to fulfill the promise. During the discussion Commander Bridgeman remarked to the Taotai that he had orders from the American admiral to remain at Chefoo until this affair was settled, and he hoped soon to be able to report its satisfactory adjustment. This remark seemed to have considerable weight with the Taotai, and it undoubtedly curtailed useless discussion.

It was reported by Chinese who came from Chi-mi, from time to time, that the people there were determined to oppose the arrest of the rioters who had been accused; and hence it appears that the magistrate was intimidated and did not undertake to arrest them, but resorted to various pretexts to screen the guilty, a course fully in keeping with his behavior from the beginning of this difficulty.

Having obtained from the Taotai his promise in writing that twenty-one more of the rioters who had been accused should be arrested and brought to Chefoo for trial before the Taotai and myself, and a day having been agreed upon for the trial, I returned to Tien-tsin.

On the 20th of May, I once again proceeded to Chefoo. This, my third visit in connection with this case, occurred nearly six months after the first outbreak in Chi-mi, and three months had elapsed since my first interview with the Taotai regarding it. The Fuh-shan magistrate had arrived from Chi-mi a few days previously, having in his custody most of the rioters he was sent to arrest. The whole number of rioters now under arrest in Chefoo amounting to twenty-eight, I decided to proceed with the trial. On May 22, I had an interview with the Taotai, when it was agreed that the trial should begin on the 25th and be held in the yamên, or court-house, near the custom-house in Chefoo, as the most commodious room available. Various preliminaries were discussed, and it was decided to put each of the accused on his trial separately.

The trial began on the 25th of May, and continued for six days, the court sitting from 2 o'clock to 6 p. m. daily. I inclose herewith a reliable report of the trial, published in the North China Herald of June 13.

The first day was wholly occupied in hearing Mr. Corbett's statement of his grievances, and when it was concluded, the Taotai expressed himself satisfied with the truth of what had been said. It only remained to identify the accused and establish their guilt, and the other five days of the trial were devoted to the examination of witnesses for that purpose. About fourteen witnesses, some of them Christians, were examined, and after the most rigid and searching cross-examination by the Taotai, who was especially severe when questioning the Christians, the accused were fully identified and proven guilty. On the third day of the trial (May 27) an unpleasant incident occurred. My official messenger and several witnesses for the prosecution had been insulted and struck by two soldiers of the Taotai's guards, and Mr. Cornabé's messenger had been refused admittance to the yamên. Upon taking my seat in court this day, I informed the Taotai of these indignities, and insisted upon the arrest and punishment of the offenders before proceeding further with the trial. The Taotai, after attempting to exculpate them, admitted the justice of my demand and sent for the two men, who were beaten in the presence of the court, whereupon the trial was resumed.

This behavior of the soldiers of the Taotai's own guard and within the precincts of his yamun was a fair indication of public feeling among the natives of Chefoo. From the time the first party of rioters were brought under arrest to Chefoo public attention had been attracted to this case, and sympathy with the rioters was expressed in various ways. During the sitting of the court large crowds assembled in the vicinity of the place, waiting with eagerness to hear the developments of the trial. No disturbance was created, but there appeared to be a deep feeling of resentment at such hitherto unheard of proceedings to vindicate the law in behalf of foreigners. This feeling was soon expressed by means of placards, in which the Taotai was vilified for partiality or submission to foreigners, and one of these placards was daringly placed on the gate of the Taotai's office. It was, perhaps, partly due to his apprehension of some anti-foreign demonstration by the people that the Taotai was attended during the trial by an armed guard of over 100 soldiers.

The trial closed on the 1st of June, and on June 3 the Taotai came to the consulate to arrange with me the terms of a final settlement. The United States gunboat Saco had arrived on the day previous, and her officers, in full uniform, were present at this interview. On being introduced to the Taotai, Commander McDougal remarked that "the American admiral had been much concerned on hearing of the difficulty in Chi-mi, and he was most desirous that it should be peaceably and satisfactorily adjusted." The Taotai replied that "the admiral need give himself no unnecessary anxiety, as a satisfactory conclusion would now probably be reached, and that he saw no reason why it could not be fully and satisfactorily adjusted between himself and the consul." For a full account of this interview, I beg to refer you to the inclosed memorandum.

After some discussion, the following terms of settlement were speedily decided upon, viz :

1. Four men convicted of having been prominently engaged in the two cases of stoning, to be beaten with the large bamboo; one of them eighty blows, two others sixty each, and one forty blows. The local constables (ti-pao) of Ko-fau and Hwa-yin to receive eighty blows each, and be dismissed from office.

2. Mr. Corbett's pecuniary losses, estimated at 380 taels, to be paid within fifteen days, by the persons who entered his house; they to be imprisoned in the mean time and the Taotai to guarantee payment.

3. The remainder of the criminals to be pardoned at my special request.

4. All of the prisoners to enter into a bond to keep the peace and guarantee Mr. Corbett's personal safety while he remains in Chi-mi. All accusations or suits arising out of this case, or connected with it in any way, to be suppressed.

5. The Taotai to issue a stringent proclamation, giving a full account of this case, and how it was settled, and threatening severe punishment upon any one who may dare to engage in similar outrages in the future.

6. When Mr. Corbett returns to Chi-mi, the Taotai is to furnish him with a special passport, and also with a letter to the Chi-mi magistrate.

On the following day, June 4, I proceeded to the Taotai's yamun, accompanied by Mr. Cornabé, Commander McDougal, and several other officers of the Saco. The Taotai was attended by the Fuh-shan magistrate.

The Taotai now submitted for my approval draughts of his proposed proclamation, and of the bonds to be signed by the prisoners. These proving to be quite satisfactory, the prisoners were then called into court, and the Taotai proceeded to pass sentence upon those condemned to punishment. He addressed them at some length, pointing out the gravity of their offense and the severity of the punishment as prescribed by law. He told them that I had requested, and the prosecutor also had desired, that they might be dealt with leniently, and for this they should be thankful. After warning them to live in peace with foreigners and native Christians when they returned to their homes, he ordered them away to receive their punishment.

Those who were to sign the bonds were then called up and seriously admonished; and, lastly, all of the prisoners, save those condemned to punishment, were brought into court, and the Taotai addressed them in words of persuasion, caution, and warning. His remarks were so appropriate and reasonable, and were delivered with such spirit and emphasis, and the duties and responsibilities of the prisoners were so clearly pointed out to them, that all who were present in court seemed to be impressed by the seriousness of the occasion. Upon the conclusion of these remarks, the bonds were signed and the court adjourned. The prisoners condemned to punishment were then conducted to a neighboring yamên, where they were beaten, as sentenced, in the presence of Mr. Cornabé, the officers of the Saco, and the acting interpreter, Mr. Hartwell. Inclosed I beg to hand you a copy of the proclamation, with a translation of the same; also copies, with translations, of the two bonds, and a memorandum of the proceedings of June 4.

Thus, after months of delay and long-protracted contention, this case was finally brought to a successful conclusion. Preventive measures promptly taken might have suppressed the disturbance in its incipient state; and an honest desire to deal fairly and show justice to foreigners, when once the violence had been perpetrated, would have attained immediately the end which has but now been reached, and spared weeks of needless discussion and inconvenience.

The progress of enlightenment and friendly feeling in this country does not appear encouraging when the obligations of a treaty made in 1858 are at this late day so little known or so wholly ignored in a coast province of China as to give rise to such disturbances among the people and such sturdy opposition on the part of the officials.

In attributing blame for such outrages, there is less excuse for the officials than for the people they govern; for although officials may be prejudiced against foreigners, they cannot be wholly ignorant of the solemn national engagements made to secure the welfare of foreigners in China. Still less can officials at the open ports be ignorant of the manner in which justice has been rendered and treaty-rights vindicated on occasions of popular outbreaks of similar nature during the past few years. If proof be still needed, the settlement of this case abundantly shows that it is the will rather than the power that is wanting in Chinese officials, to extend protection to foreigners and obtain for them redress when it is required. It is questionable whether the Taotai at Chefoo would have yielded as he did, had he not received instructions to adjust this matter from the governor of Shantung, who had heard from the tsung-li yamên; and this action of the yamên was the good result of your repeated representations to them of the importance of this case. The peculiar feature in the adjustment of this difficulty is the success of my efforts to have the offenders brought from the interior of the province, where the law and the treaty were set at defiance, to a treaty-port, where the trial could be conducted free from the intimidation of a mob, and where treaty-rights are better understood and enforced. The presence of gunboats at the open ports, and the interest taken by naval authorities in such questions as this, is a sure, and sometimes the only, guarantee of a speedy and equitable settlement. Such co-operation of the naval with the consular officers serves at once to convince the Chinese of the national character of the question under discussion, as considered in the light of a treaty obligation; the private wrong is thus exhibited more prominently to the Chinese in its nature as a public question concerning the integrity of treaties. It was to such moral support afforded by the presence in port of the United States gunboats Palos and Saco, and the personal co-operation of Commanders Bridgeman and McDougal, that the favorable settlement of this case was largely due; and therefore I would here express my thanks to the admiral of the Asiatic squadron for permitting the vessels to come to Che Foo, and also to Mr. Consul-General Seward, for having kindly represented to the admiral the desirability of sending them. It is gratifying to find that, notwithstanding the apparent hostility of the people to the Christian religion, this wrong, suffered by an American citizen who was laboring as a missionary in the interior of China, has met with adequate redress in strict conformity with treaty-rights. And although the punishment prescribed by Chinese law for the various offenses committed is much more severe than the punishment actually administered, yet the ends of justice have been sufficiently served, and the clemency shown to most of the prisoners after their conviction will doubtless produce a good effect upon themselves and others; and it is to be hoped that the proclamation which has been issued will more effectually accomplish the object for which it was intended, now that its warnings are strengthened by examples which have been made of the guilty.

The real character of this disturbance has been anti-foreign and anti-christian, and the settlement made has fully vindicated both objects of attack. Yet the Chinese are so credulous in all they hear of foreigners, and so much influenced by prejudice and superstition, that ill-feeling is soon roused to produce mischief; and when such instances occur wherever a foreigner may be in the interior, and the local official shows an unwillingness to act promptly in suppressing threatened disorder, the safest course would be for the foreigner to withdraw at once from the disturbed district and await the action of his own authorities.

Since returning to Tien-tsin, I have received a letter from Mr. Corbett, who went back to Chi-mi. He reports that the people are very friendly, and that he has met with no difficulty. This intelligence encourages the hope that the adjustment of this case will have a permanent effect for good, not only in the district of Chi-mi, but throughout the province at large, and that missionaries will reap the benefit of the time, labor, and anxiety devoted to attain the results which have now been reached.

In conclusion, I have to express my thanks to Mr. W. A. Cornabé, in charge of the consulate at Chefoo, for the active and efficient aid he has rendered throughout the case, and for the zeal he has shown in behalf of the interests committed to his charge; to Mr. J. B. Hartwell, who acted as my interpreter during the several interviews and the trial, and to whom I am under great obligation for his constant attendance and unwearied exertions; and to the several gentlemen who voluntarily acted as secretaries and assistants, and who rendered valuable service as such.

I am likewise under special obligation to Consul-General Seward for the encouragement and support he has given me in this difficult case.

I trust that my course of action and its results, as herein set forth, will meet with your approval, as well as that of the Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ELI T. SHEPPARD,
United States Consul.

[Inclosure 1 in 8 in No. 44.]

Memorandum of an interview between Eli T. Sheppard, United States consul, and Kung, Taotai at Chefoo, March 24, 1874.

CONSUL. I have been specially directed by the American minister to come here and make inquiry into the cause of the attack upon the Rev. Mr. Corbett, and the subsequent disturbance, in the district of Chi-mi, in December last.

TAOTAL. What action do you propose to take?

CONSUL. I am informed by your correspondence with Mr. Cornabé that you have been examining into the affair. I will be happy to hear the result of your investigations.

TAOTAL. I think there is fault on both sides, and both parties are to blame. I find that a native Christian, named Wang Li-tung, on the 28th day of the tenth moon, at the Yü-huang temple, attempted to kidnap a child. He is a bad man. The Chinese child was wounded. I also hear that Mr. Corbett has a Chinese woman (wife?) at Chi-mi, and three children by her.

CONSUL. If Wang Li-tung has committed any crime, it is the duty of the local authorities to punish him for it. That is none of my business, and I have no right to inquire into or meddle with it. It is Mr. Corbett's affair that I am inquiring about. He had only been there a few months before he was driven away; so the story of the Chinese wife and three children is incorrect.

TAOTAL. I do not think Mr. Corbett is to blame in any way. The people at Chi-mi are now petitioning for him to come back and live among them.

CONSUL. Has anybody ever entered any complaint against Mr. Corbett for misconduct?

TAOTAL. No; none whatever. But the native Christians at Chi-mi refuse to kneel before the magistrates in court.

CONSUL. Native Christians should be obedient to their magistrates, and kneel before them just the same as if they were not Christians. But I cannot interfere in matters between the magistrates and Chinese subjects. I have been directed by the minister to take the testimony of truthful witnesses, and, if I find Mr. Corbett's statements to be correct, to ask for the arrest and punishment of the ringleaders of the mob, and for remuneration for Mr. Corbett's losses. I have here in my hand the sworn statements of ten credible witnesses, some of whom are Christians, some not, who fully verify Mr. Corbett's statements. Now, as you acknowledge that Mr. Corbett has done nothing wrong, I must ask you to have these men, whose names I here give you, arrested at once and placed upon trial for punishment in accordance with the provisions of the eleventh article of the treaty between China and the United States.

TAOTAL. Does Mr. Corbett propose to go back to Chi-mi?

CONSUL. That depends upon circumstances, I suppose. Mr. Corbett has a passport bearing your excellency's seal, and so long as he does no harm, and continues to behave himself properly, it must be for him to decide when and where he will go. Do you propose to arrest these men, or not?

TAOTAI. Why should I? Mr. Corbett came away from Chi-mi of his own accord.

CONSUL. Is it possible that, after three months of investigation, your excellency is still ignorant that Mr. Corbett was obliged to fly to save his life from the violence of the mob?

TAOTAI. The people made a disturbance and Mr. Corbett became timid and left, but he was not compelled to leave.

CONSUL. Does not your excellency know that the magistrate of Chi-mi, to whom Mr. Corbett appealed for protection, urged him to leave because it was unsafe for him to remain longer in the city of Chi-mi?

TAOTAI. The magistrate told him he had better leave, because the people were saying that he (Mr. Corbett) was kidnapping children.

CONSUL. But your excellency has just said that there has never been any complaint against Mr. Corbett. Then why does the magistrate make this charge?

TAOTAI. I do not believe these things; but the people at Chi-mi say so.

CONSUL. Does not the magistrate of Chi-mi know that Tsêng Kuo-fan, in his memorial, after a full examination into the charges of kidnapping children by foreigners and native Christians at Tien-Tsin, declared that Christians never had been found engaged in kidnapping, and that it was contrary to the Christian religion to do so?

TAOTAI. Yes; I know that it is so.

CONSUL. Then it is your duty to instruct these people thus. If steps are not taken to suppress these idle rumors, this matter will go on from bad to worse, just as it did at Tien-tsin, where it resulted in a horrible massacre of a great many innocent people. I must repeat my request that you arrest these men for trial and punishment.

TAOTAI. If I should arrest all these men, and Mr. Corbett should afterward return to Chi-mi, there would certainly be more disturbances. The best way is for Mr. Corbett to drop it now. You see the people are friendly.

CONSUL. I see the people have torn down Mr. Corbett's house, stoned him, called him "devil," and robbed him, and now you say they charge him with kidnapping children. I don't think that looks very friendly.

TAOTAI. Will you make your request in the form of an official dispatch to me?

CONSUL. Certainly, if you are going to comply with the request, I will do so; but if you are not, there is no use of wasting the paper. Mr. Cornabé has frequently requested you to do so before.

TAOTAI. Mr. Cornabé has not asked the arrest of all these men. Will you arrest Wang Li-tung?

CONSUL. No. But if these men are arrested, I will bring Wang here. If he has done anything wrong, you can punish him.

TAOTAI. But these men have killed nobody. They have only had a fight; that is not a serious matter.

CONSUL. They have violated the treaty, and they have not been punished for it. Is that a thing of no consequence? These men must be arrested and put upon their trial for punishment.

TAOTAI. Wang must be arrested, too.

CONSUL. I will bring Wang here.

TAOTAI. Will you write your request?

CONSUL. Yes, when you promise me your compliance; not before. Mr. Cornabé's requests are in writing, and they have been wholly ignored. Do you intend to arrest the men?

TAOTAI. I want your dispatch first.

CONSUL. You have admitted that Mr. Corbett has done no wrong, and that a large crowd has made a disturbance and intimidated Mr. Corbett. I have here sufficient testimony to convict all these men of a serious crime. It is your duty by the treaty, upon my request, to arrest these men and punish them. If you cannot do so, or will not, I must go to the viceroy and the governor of this province.

TAOTAI. Their number is too great.

CONSUL. Then am I to understand that when a mob exceeds a score or so they are secure from arrest?

TAOTAI. I will promise to arrest the men named by Mr. Cornabé.

CONSUL. The fourteen additional named are equally guilty, and must be arrested.

TAOTAI. I will not do it. Let me see the proofs. I do not believe what you say.

CONSUL. Do I understand your excellency as impeaching my statement? Such an insinuation is disrespectful to the minister who sends me here, and to the Government whose commission I bear.

TAOTAI. You misunderstand me. I meant only that I do not believe the evidence which you have taken.

CONSUL. I wish to call your excellency's special attention to the provisions of the eleventh article of the treaty between China and the United States, which makes it the duty of the local Chinese official, in case of a riot or disturbance in which United States citizens are molested, attacked, or put in jeopardy, to disperse the mob and arrest and punish the offenders. In this case full three months have elapsed, and not a single arrest has been made. I now understand your excellency refuses to arrest the guilty parties. I shall report this to Peking. It is my duty to inform you that it now becomes a question for the consideration of the United States Government whether or not its own officers will make these arrests, and what further measures shall be taken to obtain redress.

TAOTAI. There is no authority in the treaty allowing you to arrest Chinese subjects.

CONSUL. If your excellency will read the last clause of the eleventh article, you will find these words: "Arrests in order to trial may be made either by the Chinese or United States authorities." What would your excellency have me to understand by that?

TAOTAI. That applies only to the open ports.

CONSUL. Does it say so?

TAOTAI, (after much quibbling.) Very well, then; you send me an official request for the arrest of these men, and I will bring them here.

CONSUL. Will you arrest them and put them on trial?

TAOTAI. I will.

CONSUL. How soon can you have them here?

TAOTAI. I cannot tell that. I will use all expedition, and will order the magistrate of Chi-mi to arrest them and come here with them, and we will all be present at the trial together.

CONSUL. Very well. I will in the mean time go to Tien-tsin and make a report of this to the minister at Peking. I will send you my official request for the arrest of these men to-morrow.

TAOTAI. I will notify Mr. Cornabé when the men are here, and he can notify you.

CONSUL. I will send you a detailed list of Mr. Corbett's losses just as soon as possible.

TAOTAI. I should like to have it.

NOTE.—On Thursday, March 26, the Taotai, after receiving Mr. Sheppard's official dispatch of the 25th, returned Mr. Sheppard's visit, and during the interview the Taotai informed Mr. Sheppard that all possible expedition would be observed in arresting and bringing the men to Chefoo for trial. He also gave Mr. Sheppard a list of names of persons whom he proposed to bring forward for examination at the same time with reference to the matter.

[Inclosure 2 in 8 in No. 44.]

Memorandum of an interview between E. T. Sheppard, United States consul, and Kung Taotai at Chefoo, May 4, 1874.

CONSUL. At our interview (March 24) your excellency promised me that you would use all diligence and dispatch in arresting the principal offenders in the Chi-mi disturbance. Your excellency has also since then informed Mr. Cornabé that you had arrested the men, as you agreed to do, and you asked for me to come here and attend their trial. Now I have come and find that only ten of the forty-two have been brought.

TAOTAI. I have brought fourteen of the men.

CONSUL. Yes; but only ten of those whom I named.

TAOTAI. I did not say I had arrested all of them.

CONSUL. You said you had arrested the men, and you asked me to attend the trial according to our agreement, which was when all of the persons named were arrested. When I come I find only ten out of the whole forty-two here. The most culpable are not brought. This has occasioned me great inconvenience and annoyance, and I come to-day to inquire of you why you have not fulfilled your promise, and to tell your excellency that my minister, to whom I must report these facts, will be greatly displeased at your delinquency.

TAOTAI. I issued an order for the arrest of all these men, as you requested. But the magistrate of Chi-mi reports that many of the men are absent fishing, some are sick, and some are visiting relations.

CONSUL. The magistrate has reported to your excellency a lot of falsehoods. I have been advised as to the movements and occupation of all these men, and I know that ten days ago they were all at their homes, that they were not sick, and there is not a single fisherman among them.

(The magistrate of Chi-mi, who was present, was so completely nonplussed by this statement that he did not attempt to deny it or refute it in any way whatever.)

CHI-MI MAGISTRATE. I issued warrants for the arrest of all these men as soon as I received the Taotai's order.

CONSUL. What day did you issue your warrants, sir?

MAGISTRATE. The 25th day of the 2d moon.

CONSUL. How long does it take for an order to reach you at Chi-mi from Chefoo?

MAGISTRATE. About four days, ordinarily.

CONSUL, (to the Taotai.) When did you send your orders for the arrests?

TAOTAI. On the 7th day of the 2d month.

CONSUL. From the 7th until the 25th is eighteen days. Deducting four days for the order to reach Chi-mi, leaves just half a month in which nothing whatever was done by the Chi-mi magistrate. Does not your excellency perceive that this magistrate has been grossly negligent? (To magistrate.) What were you doing all these two weeks, that you did not issue your warrants for the arrest of these men sooner?

Magistrate made no answer.

CONSUL, (to the Taotai.) Now your excellency sees that there has been gross neglect of duty here. I shall have to report this to my superiors.

TAOTAI. Tell me what you want done, and I will do it.

CONSUL. I want you to keep your promise, and send and bring these men here, as you promised me you would do. If you are not able to do it, I must find somebody who can.

TAOTAI. I will send the Fuh-shan hsien to make the arrests.

CONSUL. Here is a list of twenty-one names; they are a part of the original list which I sent you. The first eight named are the most culpable, and must be produced before a trial can be entered into. The others must also be brought, and the ten who are now here must be kept until they arrive, and all can be tried together.

TAOTAI. I cannot fix a day certain when I will have them here.

CONSUL. Why not?

Captain BRIDGEMAN. It is essential that the Taotai fix a day certain when he will produce these men; otherwise we may be kept waiting indefinitely. I have been sent here by the admiral to remain here pending the settlement of this affair, and I hope soon to be able to report that it has been satisfactorily adjusted.

TAOTAI. If I fix a day certain to produce these men and fail, you will come back again as you do now.

CONSUL. I do not ask for or wish your excellency to perform an impossibility. I am certain these men can be all brought if any reasonable effort is made to get them. They can all be brought here easily in ten days or less.

TAOTAI. I will get them if they are there. But you must send along with the Fuh-shan magistrate the five Christian witnesses who are now here when he goes to Chi-mi to make the arrests.

CONSUL. Why must the five witnesses go?

TAOTAI. For two reasons: first, that they may point out the guilty men, and second, that they may see that the men are arrested.

CONSUL. That is quite unnecessary. I have given you the name and place of residence of each man, and my witnesses can identify them when they are brought here for trial.

TAOTAI. Yes, but it is also desirable to have the prosecutors of this suit present when these arrests are made, so the people of Chi-mi may see at whose instance it is done, and it will make them more careful and obedient in the future.

CONSUL. That is very true, and I quite agree with your excellency. I will therefore order Mr. Corbett, who is the prosecutor of this suit, to go with the Fuh-shan magistrate to Chi-mi, to be present when these arrests are made.

TAOTAI. O, no! There is no need of Mr. Corbett's going. We do not want him.

CONSUL. Yes, your excellency, it is exceedingly necessary and proper that Mr. Corbett, the prosecutor of this suit, be present when these arrests are made, so that the people at Chi-mi may see at whose instance it is done, and it will make them more careful and obedient in the future. I propose to send Mr. Corbett along with the Fuh-shan magistrate to Chi-mi.

TAOTAI. No, no! It is the native Christians I want, not Mr. Corbett. Send the native Christian witnesses. I am satisfied that some of the Chi-mi people are guilty.

CONSUL. No, I will not do it. You are trifling with me again. If you want the prosecutor of the suit to go, I will send him; or if you want a proper constabulary force to help the magistrate bring the men, I can give you that; but I don't want any more broken promises.

TAOTAI and FU-SHAN MAGISTRATE, together. If the men are in Chi-mi or in an adjoining district we will get them.

CONSUL. Very well, I will give you fourteen days in which to redeem your promise. At the expiration of that time, I will return to Chefoo again to attend their trial.

NOTE.—The last proposition of Mr. Sheppard was agreed to, and the interview closed.

[Inclosure 3 in 8 in No. 44.]

Memorandum of the final proceedings, June 4, 1874.

CHEFOO, June 4, 1874—10 o'clock a. m.

On the consul's arriving at the court-room he was invited by the Taotai to the hall above the court-room, where was held a brief interview, during which the Taotai presented for the consul's approval the draught of the proclamation he proposes to issue; and also of the bonds he proposed to require the "house robber" and the "donkey robbers" to sign, as well as the one he intended to have signed by all the accused, binding them to keep the peace and to use their influence to preserve order in the villages in their respective neighborhoods. His excellency also promised to furnish Mr. Corbett, whenever he might wish it, with a new special passport to return with his family to Chi-mi, and also with a letter to the magistrate of Chi-mi.

Present in court, besides his excellency the Taotai and the Fu-shan magistrate, were Mr. Consul Sheppard, Mr. Cornabé, Captain McDougal, and Officers Wood, Breese, and Dr. Ayers, of the United States steamer Saco; Dr. Nevins and Mr. Farmer, secretaries, and Mr. Hartwell, interpreter.

The Taotai called before him the prisoners who had been condemned to punishment for participating in the several stonings and robberies, in their several groups, and announced to them that they had been found guilty of the charges made against them severally. He told them they deserved to be punished with great severity; that particularly those of them who were advanced in years should have restrained the younger men, instead of leading them on; and that most especially the local constables, whose duty it was to suppress such risings, were guilty of serious crime in joining in stoning and in entering the house of any person, and especially of a foreigner. Such conduct could not be tolerated, and they must be punished according to law. He said their sentence ought to be even heavier than the law ordinarily prescribes, but that Mr. Corbett, the prosecutor, through the consul, had begged, and the consul himself had asked, that they might be dealt with in mercy; and that they might congratulate themselves on getting off with no more severe punishment. He advised them, when they should go back home, to live quietly, and to be at peace with any foreigners who might be there, and with the native Christians. He then ordered them to be taken away for punishment. He then called the parties against whom evidence had been adduced that they had taken part in the robbing on the road and at Mr. Corbett's house, but who, through clemency, were not to be beaten. After lecturing them very much as he did the former groups, and assuring them that he had been in consultation with the consul for days concerning them, and that it was only through mercy, at the intercession of Mr. Corbett and the sincere wish of the consul, that they were not to be beaten, required them each to sign a document binding themselves to pay for the missing articles within fifteen days. They were told they would be locked up until the money was paid.

The whole number of the accused were now brought into court, (except the condemned,) and the Taotai addressed them at some length upon the serious nature of the offense with which they had been charged, and assured them that if the witnesses had delivered their testimony, every man of them would have had to be punished, but that Mr. Corbett and the consul, not seeking for revenge, had declined to press the matter in every case, and had urged him to exercise mercy and pardon them. He repeated to them that the consul and he had been consulting over the matter for days, both the consul and the prosecutor inclining to mercy. He asked, "How could you know what would be the effect of your stoning? Some of those stones might have seriously wounded Mr. Corbett, or even killed him, in which case several of you might have forfeited your lives." He ordered them to be peaceable and friendly with Mr. Corbett when he goes back, and with the native Christians.

They were to have no fights nor quarrels with the Christians. These Christians were still Chinese subjects; and if they did anything wrong, the people were not to take the law into their own hands, but to make their complaints to the local magistrate, and if he did not deal with the matter, they might come to the Taotai and complain, and he would see that the matter was properly investigated. And just so with any foreigner. Mr. Corbett would not do any harm; but if any foreigner should do what was wrong, they were not to attempt to redress it themselves, but to complain to him, and that he and the foreign consul would have the delinquent foreigner dealt with. That neither the foreign consul nor himself would allow a foreigner or a native to conduct himself lawlessly in the country. He made them all promise that they would drop this matter and not make any more trouble about it; that they would go home and live at peace with the foreigner and with the native Christians. They all knocked their heads in acknowledgment of this clemency; and he required each one to sign a pledge that he would not only keep the peace himself, but would urge this course upon all the villages in his neighborhood.

The Taotai then reminded them that if, after signing this bond, they should violate it, they would be dealt with more severely than if they had not signed it, and dismissed them.

The court then adjourned, and the Fuh-shan magistrate proceeded at once to his temporary office in Yentia to have the sentences of the court executed. Mr. Cornabé and the interpreter, Mr. Hartwell, were deputed by the consul to go, in company with Captain McDougal and Officers Wood, Breese, and Dr. Ayers, of the United States steamer Saco, to see the punishment inflicted.

Arrived at the Yamén, the magistrate had each culprit brought before him, and after a few words to each, ordered him to be beaten according to the sentence of the court. The blows were administered with a stick of bamboo, four feet or more in length and about two inches wide, held by the lictor in both hands. As it is the summer season, eight blows were counted ten, according to Chinese custom.

Kiang Kwan-kih professed to be sick, and begged that his son might take his place. The son being willing, the magistrate consented, and the son received nominally 80 blows, really 64; Wang I-chin received nominally 80 blows, really 64; Wang Shi-Kiai received nominally 80 blows, really 64; Wang Pao received nominally 60 blows, really 48; Kiang Hwo-sien received nominally 60 blows, really 48; Kiang Shau-sien received nominally 40 blows, really 32.

After which the deputation from the consulate retired.

The Taotai's proclamation, dated June 22, 1874.

Kung, by imperial appointment a brevet provincial treasurer, superintendent of maritime customs at Chefoo, and intendant of the circuit of Têng-chou Fu, Laichou-Fu, and Ching-chau-Fu, issues a stringent proclamation enjoining upon all an observance of the treaties, to the end that natives and foreigners may enjoy peace and security.

Among the treaties with various countries made public by the prince and ministers of the tsung-li yamén, there is found a treaty with the United States, the twenty-ninth article of which is as follows:

"The principles of the Christian religion, as professed by the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches, are recognized as teaching men to do good, and to do to others as they would have others do to them. Hereafter those who quietly profess and teach these doctrines shall not be harassed or persecuted on account of their faith. Any person, whether a citizen of the United States or a Chinese convert, who, according to these tenets, shall peaceably teach and practice the principles of Christianity, shall in no case be interfered with or molested."

Repeated commands have been issued for the observance of this article.

In the month of December, 1873, some natives of the district of Chi-mi stoned the Rev. H. Corbett, an American missionary, insulted him by calling him kwei-tzé, (devil,) and took away from him clothing and other articles. This, though at first only a small disturbance, well nigh grew into a serious affair. The case has now been taken up and justly adjudicated by myself and Mr. Sheppard, the United States consul.

With the exception of the leaders in the disturbance, who are punished, according to law, with the heavy bamboo, with degrees of severity corresponding to their offenses, the offenders are pardoned and released. All these people, in their disobedience and reckless conduct, have been guilty of breaking the laws. As this is the first offense, their punishment is inflicted with leniency, hoping to preserve peaceful relations between natives and foreigners. All persons of whatever class should give diligence to observe the treaty, that mutual friendship may be perpetuated. I have, in connection with Mr. Sheppard, the United States consul, agreed upon certain stipulations which are to be published in this proclamation; and fearing lest persons in other places may be ignorant of the treaty and recklessly make disturbance, I print this proclamation in order that it may be generally known. Hereafter all persons must observe my instructions, and thus avoid the recurrence of such misdemeanors, by which you will bring punishment upon yourselves. This is my earnest expectation.

The following are the stipulations:

1. In future, all who preach and practice the Christian religion shall receive from local magistrates the same care and protection as others, and no one will be allowed to insult and injure them. All who, according to the principles of the Christian religion, peaceably propagate or practice it, shall not therefor be molested or injured by the people.

2. Hereafter when natives see a foreigner they must address him as such, and are forbidden to call him kwei-tzé, (devil.) Those who disobey this injunction will be immediately dealt with by the local magistrate.

3. The Chi-mi suit, originating in Hwa-yin market, Yuh-hwang temple, Ko-Fau village, and other places, has now been justly settled. Hereafter you people of every place should take warning from it. If you are guilty of such proceedings again, you will incur heavy punishment.

4. This case has been justly decided and administered according to truth, and without partiality. The accused, including those who have been pardoned, have signed a bond promising to return home and peacefully pursue their several callings, without making further disturbance in seeking opportunities for revenge and retaliation against witnesses and others connected with this suit. If there are other matters or lawsuits, they must be considered by themselves, and no use shall be made of this to obstruct other suits.

5. Native Christians are Chinese subjects, and are to be governed by Chinese laws. If lawsuits arise, they are to be attended to in the Chinese courts, and foreigners have nothing to do with them. And, according to treaty, foreign missionaries are not to act for, or to shield and protect, natives. I have heard that native Christians have been guilty of going before the magistrate without kneeling, and refusing to pay taxes, and undertaking the prosecution of illegal lawsuits, and other lawless practices. I have also heard that people have endeavored to exact from native Christians contributions to the ceremony of "welcoming gods," and to idolatrous processions, repairing temples, and theatrical plays, which exactions are expressly forbidden by imperial edict. It is now agreed upon, in connection with the foreign consul, that hereafter, if native Christians or other subjects are guilty of the aforesaid misdemeanors, complaints may be brought against them before the local magistrate. If foreign missionaries act for them and protect them, the people may come to Chefoo and accuse them by name before me and the foreign consul, and the case will be impartially attended to. You must not take the matters into your own hands and stone people, and thus bring punishment upon yourselves.

[Inclosure 10 in No 44.—Translation.]

Two bonds, dated June 4, 1874.

BOND TO KEEP THE PEACE.

A voluntary bond of releasement entered into by Kiang Kwan-kih and others.

This bond, by which releasement is obtained, is in consequence of the prosecution of the undersigned by a foreigner, Rev. H. Corbett. Having had the case closely examined, it appears that Kiang Kwan-kih struck Mr. Corbett with a stone; that a stone thrown by Kiang Hwo-sien struck his horse, and that Kiang Shau-sien took part in the affray. These persons are sentenced to receive punishment according to the seriousness of the offense committed by each. All the accused are now ordered to return home and peacefully attend to their several callings, and to abstain from making disturbances in the future. Hereafter, if Mr. Corbett goes again to Chi-mi to preach and propagate Christianity, the inhabitants of the village are not to interfere with him in any way. You must not oppose and injure Christians, and must not oppress your native countrymen. And now you voluntarily promise to abide by this document, and not disobey.

[Signed by twenty-seven persons.]

BOND TO SECURE INDEMNITY.

A promissory bond given to secure the payment of indemnification within a limited time.

This is a promissory bond, given in consequence of a suit brought against the undersigned by a foreigner, Rev. H. Corbett. This suit having been carefully examined, it appears that articles were lost from Mr. Corbett's house, and the undersigned engage either to find and return the missing articles within fifteen days or to pay an equivalent in money. We voluntarily promise to abide by this agreement.

[Signed by five persons.]

Prince Kung to Mr. Williams.

TUNGCHI, 13th year, 5th moon, 17th day, (June 30, 1874.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

In relation to the quarrel which occurred at Chi-mi, in Shantung, between the people and the Christians, I have already informed your excellency that frequent orders were sent to the governor of that province to direct the proper officers to inquire into the affair with a view to its just settlement.

A dispatch has now been received from the northern superintendent of trade, inclosing the report of the intendant of circuit at Chefoo, wherein he states that, in the case of this riot between the people and Christians in Chi-mi, the parties have all been summoned before him and all the witnesses examined. In conjunction with the United States consul, the affair has been publicly investigated in the fullest manner and decided, the guilty punished, and the case finished. "I therefore respectfully make known the details," he concludes, "that you may report for information in the proper quarter that the case is settled."

I have accordingly had a copy made of the superintendent's dispatch upon the case, and beg to inclose it herewith for your excellency's information.

His Excellency S. WELLS WILLIAMS,
United States Chargé d'Affaires.

Report of the northern superintendent of trade, (Li Hungchang,) inclosing the following detailed report from Kung Yih-tu, intendant of the circuit of Y'angchau, Laichau, and Tsingchau, prefectures in Shantung, dated June 16, 1874.

On the 23d of March the governor of Shantung sent me a copy of an order he had received from the foreign office, dated March 1, in which the inquiry was made as to the cause of the quarrel between the people of Chi-mi and an American missionary there, and directing me to see that the district magistrate there examined into the affair and equitably settled it. I at once sent him the order to inquire into the cause of the disturbance, and let me know everything that he did, and at the same time reported a summary of the affair and what I had done to the governor, for him to communicate to the foreign office.

On the 20th of May I received from the governor a copy of another order from the foreign office, dated April 23, in which I was urged to more diligence, and directed to bring the parties to the trial all together, and jointly examine them in the most careful manner, so as to elicit the facts and settle the affair in accordance with justice.

I had already directed Meh, the district magistrate at Chi-mi, to transfer Kiang Kwan-kih and others, parties and witnesses in this case, to my court, where, with the foreign missionary, Hunter Corbett, and the native Christians, Wang Li-tung and others, they could all be examined, and a joint trial held with the consul.

Among the documents in the case was one dated December 22, received from W. A. Cornabé, United States vice-consul, in which he told me that Mr. Corbett had been assaulted at a market-place called Hwa-yin, by a crowd around a theater, and struck by stones thrown in the mêlée. Further, that on the 19th of December he was preaching near the temple of Yuh-hwang, at Hwa-yin, when he was struck by stones thrown at him from the crowd, and his assistants, Wang Li-tung and others, also wounded in the fray.

The vice-consul further said he had heard that the inhabitants of Chi-mi had assembled to the number of 300, each of whom had ten others at his back, and all intended to go into the town for the purpose of injuring Mr. Corbett. The magistrate was powerless to protect him, and he had, therefore, fled on the 22d, and reached Chefoo. A letter had afterward been received from his assistant, stating that on that day about two thousand men from the southern association of villages entered the town seeking a quarrel. The magistrate had gone out to disperse them, but was powerless to effect anything.

In another note he alleged that on the 24th a man named Sü Yen-tsoh and half a score of fellows with him, all belonging to Chi-mi, had carried off Mr. Corbett's things and a hired donkey; and in the afternoon of that day they had gone to Ko-fau and carried off all his furniture and effects, with his cow, cleaning everything out and breaking the windows and doors of his house to pieces.

Subsequently he informed me that a convert named Che Chung-yuen, belonging to the village of Pau-hein, had had his fruit and timber trees, all cut down by people of the place. On the same day, Wang Yung-chun, a convert living in Ta-lao Village, had been attacked by persons entering his house, who robbed it and greivously wounded his left eye; also, one Sun Wan-lun, of the village of Tung-kia-ngan, was robbed and ill-used by some persons, and his uncle carried off by force. The vice-consul accordingly requested that these proceedings might be inquired into and the evil-doers punished. I immediately sent repeated orders to the district magistrate at Chi-mi to strictly inquire into the matter and punish the offenders. This can all be shown by the records.

While I was issuing these orders and making these inquiries, Mr. Sheppard, the United States consul, came from Tein-tsin down to Chefoo. At an interview I had with him, he told me that he had received directions from the American minister at Peking to go down and inquire into this affair, and have all the witnesses and others connected with the case brought to Chefoo, that we might there jointly try and settle it.

I accordingly ordered the magistrate of Chi-mi to remove the case to Chefoo. Mr. Sheppard agreed that he would cite the plaintiff, Corbett, and five converts to be present, when we could thoroughly examine the case. He also gave me the names of the leaders in the riotous proceedings at Chi-mi, forty-two persons in all, and a full list of the clothes and other things lost by Mr. Corbett, valued, all together, at 380 taels.

Having received these lists, I sent two messengers to Chi-mi; and on the 16th of May the prisoners and all persons connected with the case were in Chefoo. I notified Consul Sheppard of these things, and requested him to appear with the plaintiff and the witnesses on his side. On the 25th the United States consul and Sung Tsoh-pin, district magistrate of Fuh-shan, being present, I opened the court and began the trial.

Seeing from the first that this case was likely to be a troublesome one, having many points mixed in it, while those pertaining to the foreigners ought alone properly to be the subject of this joint trial and sentence; but the accusations by the converts, who were Chinese, and therefore a portion of our own people, belonged only and of right to the local rulers, whose duty it was to settle all such quarrels, and foreigners had nothing whatever to do with them. I stated these points to Mr. Sheppard, who cordially assented. There were several cases brought forward by the vice-consul, viz, that of the assault and wounding of Wang Lih-tung; of cutting down the trees belonging to Ché Chung-yuen; of the injury done to Wang Yang-chun; and, lastly, of robbing Sun Wán-lun; all of which were wrongs arising between natives of China, with which foreigners had no concern, and were accordingly referred to the local authorities for trial and punishment.

There would then remain for our joint investigation only the attack on Mr. Corbett and subsequent loss of his things, and to ascertain whether there was a combination among the people of Chi-mi to molest and injure him. We continued the trial for successive days, bringing forward the prisoners one after the other, and taking evidence carefully upon each charge.

It was proved that no organized combination existed among the people for purposes of plunder and sedition; and I therefore asked the vice-consul what evidence he had for the assertion made in one of his letters, that two thousand people had entered Chi-mi in a tumultuous manner and that the magistrate was unable to disperse them. In the inquiries made as to the origin of such a false rumor, Mr. Corbett testified that after the attack made upon him, near the temple of Yuh-hwang, some of the converts told him that during the next night the people of the farmsteads in and around Kofau had lighted no end of their lanterns, and roamed over the country, from which they feared there was a consultation going on. But this was not satisfactory proof of the charge.

As to the charge that the district magistrate was unable to protect him, it appeared from the testimony of the convert Lin Lung-méi, at the time of the military examinations at the place, on the 22d of December, that many candidates were gathered on the parade-ground, and when the magistrate went out of the gates to inspect them he saw several scores of people kneeling by the roadside, whom he (the convert) was told were there for the purpose of complaining against the foreigner. From this idle rumor came the story that two thousand men had entered the town, whom the local magistrate could not control or disperse, and the other charge that there was a seditious combination of the people with intent to murder, against which the officials could not protect him. Inquiry proved them both to be unfounded.

I then asked the vice-consul about his statements, and he acknowledged that they arose from incorrect information; and, therefore, in respect to the two counts of plotting violence, and inability of obtaining official protection [for Mr. Corbett,] it was needless to inquire further.

In relation to the charge of twice stoning Mr. Corbett, the testimony of Wang I-chin and Kiang Kwan-kih was as follows: They were at a theatrical performance at Hwa-yin on the 1st of December, as Mr. Corbett rode by on a horse, and some persons picked up stones and sent them flying so that he was hit. How could any one tell who it was, among such a crowd, that picked up the stones? Also, on the 19th of the month, a great crowd was collected at the Yuh-hwang temple to get up a procession for the gods, and Mr. C. began to preach near by: some persons in the multitude threw stones to hit him, but nobody could well know who it was.

Mr. Corbett, on being called on for his evidence upon this matter, was unable to point out the very persons; nor could those whom he brought as witnesses to identify the guilty ones, and particularize which ones threw the stones, and which hit him, as if they had seen it all with their own eyes, tell me, when I questioned them myself as to their proof, which were the very men, or bring any trustworthy evidence.

On further carefully sifting their evidence on this point, they averred that the first man who picked up a stone at Hwa-yin was Wang Pao; and in reference to the charge of throwing stones at the Yuh-hwang temple, they said that there were many people named Kiang in that village, and this man, Kiang Kwan-kih, was head man of it, was present at the time of the fracas, and could not restrain the people. Two others named Kiang Shau-sien and Kiang Hwo-sien, were there, too, and cognizant of the facts. These were all the facts which could be proved concerning the two occasions when stones were thrown.

In relation to the charge of Mr. Corbett twice losing things, the convert, Lin Lung-méi, testified as follows: When Mr. C. returned to Chefoo he left the care of all his effects in my hands and I hired a donkey of one Wang Lih-sien to carry them to Ko fau. This last named says that the villagers, Sü Yen-tsoh and Tu Kwang-tsüen, carried the whole away with them, by force. On cross-questioning these two men they declared that Wang Lih-sien owed Tu Kwang-tsüen, who, seeing him that day going off leading a donkey tried to distrain it and the load as a security for his claim. He could not tell how the things came to be lost, but he never had any idea of stealing them. However, after the trouble taken in this examination, he was quite willing to make good the loss of the things taken at their fair price.

Two men, Wang Lih-sien and Wang Lih-hai, further gave evidence that in the afternoon of that day the village constable, Wang Shi-kiai, and some thirty others went to Mr. Corbett's hired house, at Ko-fau, broke into it and carried off all the clothes and furniture and destroyed the doors and windows. I then asked this constable about it, who said that he and Li Fah, Sun Shi-tang, and three others went to Ko-fau; and hearing that Mr. C. had returned to Chefoo they started off to see his chapel. They urged one Wang Lih-hao to open the doors for them to go in and then went out after looking about them; but half a score of other fellows whom he did not know rushed in at the same time. He did not know at all what things were lost, but had no intention of robbing anything, and was willing to compensate for the articles lost.

Such being the facts, I judged that as Tu Kwang-tsüen led away the donkey under the idea of distraining it for debt, and Wang Shi-kiai and the crowd went into the house without any intention of robbing, and both were willing to pay the value of the things lost, it was needless for us to examine them any further. The consul also agreed that this was sufficient. These are the circumstances connected with the double robbery of Mr. Corbett.

The eleventh article of the American treaty provides that subjects of China, guilty of any criminal act toward citizens of the United States, shall be punished by the authorities of China according to the laws of China; and I find that our statutes lay down eighty blows of the bamboo as the heaviest punishment for doing wrong without previous intention.

In this case Wang I-chin and Wang Shi-kiai both hold the post of village constables. When the row began they could not restrain the crowd, and made no report of their violence; the last-named also led people into the house, whereby many small things were lost.

The man Kiang Kwan-kih is a village elder; he was unable to restrain his sons and nephews; and having been at the theater himself, he is responsible for what happened there. All of these are amenable to the above law, and each of them is sentenced to receive eighty blows.

Wang Pao, who threw the first stone, and Kiang Shau-sien, who was at both the frays, are each sentenced to sixty blows. Kiang Hwo-sien, who participated in one of them only, is sentenced to forty blows. Tu Kwan-tsüen, and the others who carried off the donkey, pretending that it was for a debt, with Wang Shi-kiai, and those who entered the house, whereby many things were lost, have all agreed to repay their cost. The latter must, after he has done so, be dismissed from his post as constable; and the two with him may receive their pardon. Seventeen others, who were not proved to have joined in the riot, were liberated there in open court; while those sentenced to be beaten were punished in accordance therewith, and then sent home. Tu Kwang-tsüen, and those ordered to pay the 380 taels for the things lost, as the list handed in by the consul stated, were detained until the money was paid to Mr. Corbett.

I have also issued a proclamation, stating distinctly, that whenever Mr. Corbett goes to Chimi district to teach religion, and quietly attends to his proper vocation, he will be protected according to the treaty. He is not to be molested in any way. So there is hope that now all parties will live in peace.

I now send all the papers connected with the case, the details of the examination and the circumstances of the closing, arranged in order for your inspection, and have the honor to request that this affair may be reported to the foreign office as having been satisfactorily settled.

On receiving the above, I (the superintendent of the northern ports) having separated the papers in this case, now send up the clear report which I have made, and have the honor to request that the conduct and finishing of this case may be looked into.

Mr. Corbett and others to Mr. Sheppard.

CHEFOO, June 4, 1874.

The undersigned, citizens of the United States of America, residing at Chefoo and Tungechow, desire to express their thanks to Eli T. Sheppard, esq., United States consul for Tien-tsin and Chefoo, for the energy and efficiency which he has displayed in prosecuting the case relating to the recent disturbance at Chimi.

The difficulties inherent in the case, together with the obstacles thrown in the way by the Chinese officials, and their determined and persistent opposition to take any proper action to elicit the truth, made the affair an especially difficult one. Fortunately Mr. Sheppard knew his rights, and firmly insisted upon having them acknowledged.

His determination to uphold and vindicate the honor of his country, and the satisfactory settlement which he has received, give us a high appreciation of him as a man and a worthy representative of our Government in China.

No. 46.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 20, 1874. (Received September 12.)

SIR: I have the honor to send for your information a series of papers relating to the Woosung bar, near Shanghai, and the effort which has been made by all the legations to induce the Chinese authorities to dredge it so as to allow the mail steamers and other large ships to pass at high tide.

In addition to what is contained in these inclosures, other examinations have been made by competent observers; but it does not seem to be worth while to introduce their reports, seeing that you have here the estimates of the expense of clearing the passage, the reasons for doing it now, the detail of the needless outlay for transshipments caused by not doing it, and an opinion of the partial results likely to be effected by carrying it out in the way proposed.

In the printed paper (inclosure 1) the most valuable report is that of Mr. Hjousbery, on page 5, wherein the nature of the bar, and the variations it undergoes at different seasons of the year, are described.

The annoyance and irritation which this obstruction to the ready navigation of the river continually causes in the mercantile community of Shanghai may be somewhat inferred from the two lists, at the end, of vessels detained by it, thereby disarranging the plans of all who are connected with their business.

In bringing the matter before the Chinese government, it was deemed best to present a nearly identical note, detailing the salient features of the grievances now endured by the existence of the bar, and urging immediate action, (inclosure 2.) A full representation of the nature of the work to be done was previously made to the members of the foreign office, who also inspected the chart referred to in the printed inclosure, prepared under the direction of Rear-Admiral Jenkins.

* * * * *

The prince's answer, (inclosure 3,) deferring a definite decision until another survey could be made, was the merest excuse for procrastinating a determination not to do it at present, at least, whatever he might ultimately decide.

The survey spoken of as having been made in 1870 was nearly useless for any practical purpose; but as the recent examination was not particularly mentioned in the first letter, a second note was returned by each legation, (inclosure 4,) informing him of it, and that its careful accuracy quite superseded the necessity of another. His answer (inclosure 5) well exhibits the difficulty of leading these officials to adopt a measure which, at a small cost, would be acceptable to foreigners, and measurably beneficial to themselves at the same time. The report from the southern superintendent of trade is a curious piece of reasoning, looked upon as an endeavor to avoid the direct issue, and throw the undesirableness of clearing the bar upon national safety and endangering the facilities nature had there provided for defending the passage of the river against a hostile force. It is also quite characteristic of the Chinese in its assumption of facts, such as that the bar prevents the ocean silt from going farther up the river, and its existence one hundred and twenty years ago; but it is not usual for them to bring so many facts and arguments to fortify a conclusion which the writers think cannot be controverted, viz, a regard for national defense. The paper no doubt carries much weight in the minds of native readers.

Since it was received, a previous report made by the intendant of Shanghai has been published, in which he tries to prove to the superintendent of trade that the bar cannot be deepened, in the following terms:

"Having hired a boat, we examined the place on all sides, and find that a sand-bank runs across the river in an oblique direction about four or five li, but the river here being very wide, we had no means of measuring the distances; and the sand-bank being under water, we could only guess at its extent. The country-people and boatmen being examined, all stated that the character of this sand-bank has long been exceedingly changeable, at one time collecting, at another disappearing, now on the east, now on the west, sometimes high, sometimes low, sometimes large, sometimes small, so that it has got the name of spirit-sand. But, fortunately, wherever the bank grows up, there is sure to be by the side of it an opening sufficient to allow large vessels to go through; if one does not know this opening, and by mistake gets upon the sand with a falling tide, he may easily find himself in difficulty. This is the true state of affairs as regards the bar. Further, the waves are so large and the body of water so great that not only would any efforts by Chinese be unavailing, but even if foreign machines were used for dredging, the sand would fill up again as fast as it was removed. It would be, as Mr. Hart says, merely throwing money in the dirt."

Prince Kung's reply is evidently framed with reference to the last sentence in the superintendent's report, which is, "It is not easy to provide the means;" and this was no doubt influenced by the conviction in his mind that, if forced to dredge the bar, the money to do it must come out of the provincial revenue and not from the customs duties.

The inaccuracy of some of the statements, and fallacy of others, in this reply, induced the preparation of an answer, (inclosure 6,) which was sent more to place on record a denial of the assertions and deductions of the superintendent than with any hope of changing the decision of the government. This answer was not made by all the legations, nor in the same terms, for some deemed it to be quite useless to argue any further, as there was no probability of inducing it to consider the proposal on its own merits or the facility it promised to the trade of the port.

In all this discussion, of which only the outlines are here given, the united voice of the mercantile community at Shanghai and of the foreign representatives at the capital, backed by the remonstrances of the British and French governments, at the apathy of the imperial authorities to the inconveniences suffered in consequence of this bar, has all been treated with complete indifference. The report of two or three low officials, sent by the intendant at Shanghai to investigate a matter of which they had no practical knowledge, has more weight than the opinion of experts as to its expediency and cheapness; and the supreme authorities shelter themselves for their disregard of this opinion by a fallacious excuse that they are bound first to consult their own security.

* * * * *

The question was one day discussed in the legations as to the alternative of stopping the tonnage dues on ships detained by the bar from reaching their dock in time; but nothing was said to the yamên in this direction. It was generally felt that as the tonnage-dues were all now usefully employed in maintaining the present light-house system along the coast, or in constructing new lights, it was very undesirable to do anything to jeopard that revenue and outlay without express instructions.

If the money for dredging could have been taken from the tonnage-dues, the superintendent of trade would probably have favored the scheme, whose cost must otherwise come out of the likin taxes levied in his jurisdiction for local purposes; for it is a well-known principle that each provincial government is expected to defray all its own expenses. He was known to be opposed to the enterprise, and his arguments as to its risk to the safety of the port, its inutility and damage to the native shipping and adjacent fields, the impossibility of doing it effectually, were all, one can hardly doubt, brought forward to fortify his previous decision against it.

This is a good instance of the power of the high provincial authorities, when they are disposed, to prevent the central government from carrying out a useful design; but the latter is careful not to commit itself to a course until the views and ability of its subordinates have been ascertained. Nor is this unsuitable, seeing that the governor is not only expected to decide on the wisdom of a measure, but is obliged to find the funds, and is held responsible for the success of the undertaking. Our ideas of the functions and power of a central government cannot properly be applied to the relations existing between the Emperor of China and his proconsular governors.

This is illustrated by the fact that, while Governor-General Ho, at Nanking, finds so many good reasons for not deepening the Woosung bar, his colleague, Governor-General Li, at Tien-tsin, has nearly contracted for one of Osgood's dredging-machines to dig out the Grand Canal at its junction with the Pei-ho.

The minute from Mr. Hart, in relation to the topography and physics of the embouchure of the Yang-tse, and its connection with the Hwangpu River, (inclosure 7,) contains many facts and deductions bearing upon the utility or otherwise of the present scheme. The impotence of human efforts to guide or restrain the action of such mighty rivers in depositing their silt makes it desirable to collect and scrutinize all such data bearing on a plan like this; and the even flow of the Yang-tse, and the uniformity of its deposits, makes it safer to estimate results in this case than in some other rivers.

The only thing now asked of this government is to take measures to increase the depth of water on the bar so as to allow vessels drawing four fathoms to cross at high tide; and this has been shown to be practicable, and its immediate execution a great necessity.

The cost bears a very slight proportion to a trade valued last year at more than seventy millions of dollars, whose customs-revenue is collected entirely by foreigners, and to facilitate which neither the local nor central governments can be induced to try the cheap experiment of dredging this bar a few feet.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 29, 1874.

SIR: Referring to your dispatch, No. 34, and to your conversation with certain Chinese officials, in relation to the late expedition of the Japanese against the natives of Formosa, I have to reply that the instruction contained in the dispatch of April 8 was confined to the particular case then referred to, and to a time of peace. Your efforts to detach the citizens of the United States who were engaged in the expedition referred to are approved.

You state in your dispatch that you had informed certain officials in this conversation that the Americans entering into the military service of China or Japan did so at their own risk, and that the Government would take no notice of their death under such circumstances. Your answer goes further than the Department feels justified in approving.

In case such American citizens should be killed in battle in the ordinary course of civilized warfare no notice would be taken thereof; but the United States will expect that no unusual or inhuman punishment be inflicted upon any of its citizens who may be taken prisoners, but that they shall be treated according to the accepted rules of civilized warfare.

Where the exercise of a commission or the enlistment in a foreign service is not prohibited by law, the fact that a war arises between the country in whose service a citizen of the United States may be and another nation, with which the United States are at peace, does not, in the opinion of this Department, create an obligation "to refuse to serve or to leave the flag thus employed."

Such fact is of not infrequent occurrence. Citizens of all nationalities were engaged on both sides during the rebellion, and such has frequently been the case with European nations.

I fail to perceive that the doctrine of extritoriality affects the question of the rights of citizens of the United States to engage in the service of foreign powers when not prohibited by law, or that it becomes unlawful because of the engagement being made with a non-Christian power. China has not infrequently availed herself of the services of Americans, as in the case of Ward and Burgevine, and it is not for her to take exception against this Government that it refuses to interfere to prevent its citizens from entering into foreign military service which may not be prohibited by law.

It is believed by this Department that the provisions of the act of June 22, 1860, afford ample power to the ministers of the United States to issue proclamations, or writs, and even to resort to force, in case of a violation of its provisions, and it is believed that these powers conferred upon the minister will prove sufficient in these cases.

This Department is officially informed by the Secretary of War that Mr. Wasson, said to be attached to the expedition against the natives of Formosa, has not been in the service of the United States since July 1, 1872.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 15, 1874. (Received October 12.)

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you a short correspondence relating to the principle of extritoriality, which has for Americans in this part of the world a particular interest; and a case like the one here described has not heretofore occurred as a practical question in our relations with the colonial government of Hong-Kong.

The case is briefly this: An American, named W. Jackson, appealed to Mr. Seward for protection against arrest, at Shanghai, on a warrant from the magistracy at Hong-Kong, (inclosure 1,) whose colonial secretary makes a request for the man's delivery after he had come under the cognizance of the consul-general, and thus indirectly acknowledges his interposition, (inclosure 2.) The latter appeals to the extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States as containing the rules which must govern the surrender, (inclosure 3;) but after the case had been abandoned, a review of the circumstances leads me to the conclusion that it does not come within the scope of the extradition treaty, (inclosure 4.)

I have no additional information relating to the circumstances under which the alleged piracy was committed, nor why the man Jackson was not sooner arrested, or where he went during the four intervening months; but these details would probably not at all affect the question.

As the Hong-Kong authorities have given up the case, it is now only a matter of discussion, whose decision by the Department is requested for guidance in the future. If I learn the reasons why they gave it up I will inform you, should there be anything of interest in them.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Williams.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, June 26, 1874.

SIR: A case has recently occurred, to which I respectfully call your attention.

A man named Jackson was some time since arrested by the police of the municipality upon a telegram from Hong-Kong, which stated that he had committed an act of piracy on a British vessel upon the high seas. He was arrested as a British subject, but whether upon a warrant from the British court here I do not know. After arrest he claimed to be an American citizen. I examined his claim and requested the police to deliver him to me, at the same time asking the police superintendent to report the fact to Hong-Kong; when this was done, the Hong-Kong authorities addressed our consul there, and he telegraphed to me that the case against Jackson was prima facie a good one. I responded that I would consider a request for his delivery. I next received a letter from the colonial secretary, a copy of which and my answer I inclose. At a still later moment, I received a telegram from Hong-Kong saying that the prosecution had been abandoned, and I accordingly released the man.

I shall be glad to know whether the course I have taken in this matter meets your approval.

The procedure under the provision of our extradition stipulations with Great Britain is simple and direct, and I doubt whether we can do better than follow it out in each case.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 54.]

Mr. Austin to Mr. Seward.

COLONIAL SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Hong-Kong, June 5, 1874.

SIR: I am instructed by his excellency Governor Sir Arthur Kennedy to make requisition for the delivery up to justice of Walter Jackson, who is charged with the crimes of piracy and of assault with intent to commit murder within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, namely, on the high seas, on board the British bark Satsuma, on or about the 29th of January, 1874. A warrant for the apprehension of the said Walter Jackson to answer the above charge of piracy has been issued from the magistracy of this colony, upon sworn information laid before a magistrate.

I have, &c.,

J. GARDNER AUSTIN.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 54.]

Mr. Seward to Mr. Austin.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, June 11, 1874.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive a letter from you dated the 4th instant, in which you state that you are instructed by Governor Kennedy to make requisition for the delivery up to justice of Walter Jackson, who is charged with the crimes of piracy and of assault with intent to commit murder within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, namely, on the high seas, on board a British vessel, and that a warrant for the apprehension of Jackson to answer the charge of piracy has been issued from the magistracy of the colony upon sworn information before the magistrate.

I hold under arrest the person referred to, and will detain him until the government of Hong-Kong has had reasonable opportunity to submit to me the evidence upon which this requisition is made.

I desire to point out that I am under no obligation to deliver Jackson excepting in accordance with the provisions for the extradition of criminals as settled by treaty between our governments.

At the same time, if, as I may judge from the informality of the demand made upon me, it is the opinion of the colonial authorities that a simpler and more rapid procedure than that indicated in the treaty referred to is reciprocally desirable, I shall be very glad to learn the views of the governor upon this subject, or to learn that he has communicated these views in any way to the superior authorities of my Government.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD.

[Inclosure 4 in No. 54.]

Mr. Williams to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 11, 1874.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 26th of last June, (No. 374,) with its inclosures, relating to the case of Walter Jackson, a seaman belonging to the British ship Satsuma, who was charged with complicity in a case of piracy, and assault with intent to murder, on board that vessel, but who, having escaped to Shanghai, claimed your protection from arrest under a warrant from the British authorities of Hong-Kong, because of his being an American citizen.

This case presents some peculiarities which render it worthy a careful examination. The piracy is said to have been committed on or about the 29th of last January, and Mr.

Austin's letter is dated June 6, or more than four months after, during which interval it is not said where the ship went, or where Jackson escaped from her, but he had then been arrested in Shanghai as a British subject. He then applied to you for protection against this arrest, solely on the ground of his citizenship. You consented to protect him, and proposed to Mr. Austin to detain him until the government of Hong-Kong had had reasonable time to submit to you the evidence upon which the requisition was made; adding, as a reason, that you are "under no obligation to deliver Jackson, except in accordance with the provisions for the extradition of criminals, as settled by treaty between the respective governments."

In my view the extradition treaty between the United States and Great Britain does not apply to this case at all; and if so, you had consequently no power to interpose to prevent the rendition of Jackson from Shanghai by the municipal police on the warrant of the Hong-Kong government. It seems to me that the provisions of that treaty are intended to apply only to the territory of the United States, and they cannot be extended to the territory of the Emperor of China. Neither of the two governments in question has any need of an extradition treaty with China, for she has yielded all her rights over the persons of the subjects of both nations, and they cannot exchange or avoid their allegiance within her territory.

The phraseology of the treaty shows that crime must be committed within the jurisdiction of either, and that the criminals must have sought an asylum or be found within the territories of the other nation. This upholds my conclusion that Jackson, in the eye of the law, was still a British subject, and amenable to the laws of Great Britain. He was charged with piracy on British territory, and the British treaty with China gave the authorities of Hong-Kong power to claim him anywhere in her territory. But if a native-born British subject had committed piracy on board an American ship, and had fled to Hong-Kong to evade arrest from your consular warrant, the stipulations of the extradition treaty would properly guide your measures taken to execute a writ of habeas corpus, and bring him up for trial in your court in China, for the simple reason that that island is British territory. The essential element of that treaty being territorial jurisdiction, its stipulations could not apply in Jackson's case, under the present circumstances, but would have done so if they had been reversed as above supposed.

The case of David Williams may be referred to. He was tried in your consular court in 1864 for piracy and murder, convicted, and sentenced to be hung, but appealed to the British consul to protect him because he was a Welshman by birth. The appeal was denied because the crime was committed under the American flag, though in Chinese waters; but neither party referred to the extradition treaty, which was felt to be totally inapplicable, because neither of them had territorial jurisdiction where the crime was committed.

Jackson could not escape his accountability for his crime by leaving his ship and fleeing to China, and there pleading his birthright of an American citizen, to exempt him from British jurisdiction, and your evident intention was to deliver him up as soon as the call was presented, but I conclude that you had no right to detain him.

If your interposition had any influence in preventing his trial and a merited punishment of his crime, I regret that it was extended to him, but rather infer that other things may have come to light to induce the authorities in Hong-Kong to abandon the prosecution.

I shall communicate a copy of this dispatch to the British minister here for transmission to Sir Arthur Kennedy.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, September 3, 1874. (Received October 29.)

SIR: Since my dispatch of the 22d ultimo (No. 55) was sent to the Department nothing decisive has taken place between the Chinese and Japanese ministers in this city in reference to the Formosan question. There have been long and excited discussions between them, but I suppose the chief reason for delay has been the appointment of a new envoy from Yedo, who comes with full instructions. The interval has been diligently occupied by both parties in mustering their forces in readiness for the coming strife; and the people on the coast are becoming enthusiastic in the affair, owing very much to the circulation of two or three native newspapers. Yet my strong belief is that the Peking government does not relish or desire the struggle, and is ready to take any measures to restrain the tribes in Formosa from repeating their violence, if the Japanese will leave.

I am so confident that you have been informed of every important particular connected with the arrest and discharge of General Le Gendre, by the consuls at Amoy and Shanghai, that I shall not repeat what they have written about it. Mr. Seward has sent me a copy of his dispatch No. 797, in relation to it, and I only refer to it in this place in explanation of the following short extract from a reply sent him on the 31st ultimo:

In view of the whole question, and the difficulty of finding witnesses to prove charges against General Le Gendre of having violated the neutrality act, I think you could hardly have done otherwise than discharge him. To send him to Japan for trial would have also been attended with the same difficulty of proving the charges or of getting the attendance of witnesses. The arrest has, however, had its effect in showing the Chinese our desire to carry out treaty stipulations.

I, however, inclose copies of the protest of Mr. Go Sheki, acting Japanese consul at Amoy, with Mr. Henderson's reply, and my dispatch to him upon it, (June 1, 2, and 3,) and General Le Gendre's protest, (inclosure 4,) in order to facilitate reference to them. These protests involve one or two points in international law which, so far as I can learn from Wheaton, have not been prominently brought forward in treatises on the subject.

In Europe, where Turkey is the only power under the restraint of the ex-territoriality law, there has been no risk of one of her envoys being interfered with as he went over the continent by entering into the limits of a nation where the same ban prevailed, and, therefore, the question of the status and privileges of her diplomatic agent in the territories of the other could not arise. Neither would it enter into her view to appoint as her envoy anybody beside one of her own subjects to represent her abroad, and especially in a state subject to the same disabilities, and this would prevent this point of his immunities coming up.

In General Le Gendre's case, it has happened that the Japanese consul claims for him immunity against the jurisdiction of his own national authorities, simply on the ground of his enjoying the privileges of a diplomatic agent. This protest states, for the first time to my knowledge, that General Le Gendre was "His Imperial Japanese Majesty's special commissioner in China," but no such announcement was made by the Mikado's government to the United States legation in Japan before he left that country. None of the Japanese officials in China have informed this legation or the United States consuls of the appointment, and it seems to me that this act of courtesy was necessary as a preliminary to his being accepted as a commissioner by the Chinese officials. General Le Gendre came to Peking last year as one of Soyeshima's suite, but that subordinate position was altogether different from the present one claimed for him. But whatever his own national authorities might say or claim in the premises, I think that until he had presented his credentials, and been acknowledged by the Chinese government as a diplomatic officer, he could not be considered as such by any one. No Japanese official had informed the Chinese authorities, so far as I know, that he had been sent on a diplomatic mission by the Mikado, and his pretended national character could not be claimed in immunity of arrest by the United States consul.

* * * * *

In view of all these things, I conclude that the protest of Mr. Go Sheki is entitled to no weight, and that he had no grounds for making it. To allow its propriety in any degree would allow the Japanese government the right to employ American citizens in China to carry on its hostile operations against the peace of this country. It would compel American consuls to see their countrymen plotting in China against its government, and disregarding the obligations of treaty without the power vindicating the dignity and position of the United States.

In his protest General Le Gendre lays great stress on the fact that as he was engaged by the Japanese government in accordance with Article X of the American treaty, before it invaded Formosa, or committed any hostile act, and with the permission of the United States minister in Japan, he is, therefore, to obey all its orders during those hostilities. That article allows the Japanese government to engage American citizens in the United States (and elsewhere, too, I infer) in any lawful capacity, but his deduction that such an engagement carries with it permission to break a treaty-right is fallacious. To say, in addition, as he does in the same paragraph, referring to the neutrality act, that he is beyond its application because when he accepted his present task he was without the jurisdiction of the United States, is even still more so, for neither in China nor Japan can he place himself without that jurisdiction.

It seems to me that his protest shows throughout a singular misconception of the application of the laws he quotes. Article X is brought forward to release himself from United States jurisdiction in China, because he had been engaged by the Japanese before they had committed any hostile act within Chinese territory, and because this article was a law before the act of Congress of June, 1860, and therefore is paramount to it. But in my view there is no difference between being engaged while Japan is at war with any power in amity with the United States, and afterward engaging in active hostilities after entering her service because she ordered it. The plain intent of the proviso is to restrain American citizens from aiding Japan in any military or naval capacity at any time or place out of her own territory; and a subsequent state of war must work the same disability that an actual state would have done at the time of engagement.

General Le Gendre has rather altered the meaning of the proviso by changing the phraseology, but I do not suppose he intended to do so in any degree. It reads: "Provided, That no articles that are contraband of war shall be exported [from the United States], nor any persons engaged to act in a naval or military capacity, while Japan shall be at war with any power in amity with the United States." He quotes it, "that such person shall not be engaged to act," &c., in order; apparently, to fortify his inference as to the time of engagement, and prove that subsequent hostilities could have no retrospective action in invalidating his freedom to serve the Japanese in a war against China.

His remark, that the act of 1860 was framed chiefly because "some American adventurers, notably Ward and Burgevine, had taken an active part in the troubles between the Chinese government and the Taiping rebels, Burgevine having given his aid on both sides," is erroneous. When the act was framed in 1860, the proceedings of General Ward were hardly known in the United States, and Burgevine's career was from 1863 to 1865.

Even if he is correct in assigning this reason for inserting the clause in section 24, that it referred primarily to civil wars, his deduction, that the stipulation in the prior treaty with Japan overrides it, is unsound, for as soon as a person engaged in the service of Japan leaves that country and arrives in this, he comes under the operation of the treaty with China. He cannot quote the treaty with one belligerent to do wrong to the other, by breaking its treaty, and that with China should be paramount, according to General Le Gendre's reasoning, for it is the oldest of the two. He is so taken up with his postulate, that a prior engagement with Japan justifies a subsequent wrong to China, that he is unconscious of the incongruity.

Speaking of the act of 1860, and the prior obligation of the treaty of 1858, he adds, "I say that the law of 1860 never could have been understood by its framer to apply to Japan, and that it was never intended that it should." I should have thought that, knowing that the framers of the act had the treaty of Japan before them, the general would have been led to doubt his own reasoning in his own favor, and concluded that they intended to define the limits of Article X, and restrain American citizens from doing what he and Mr. Cassell and Mr. Wasson are now doing.

Some persons have questioned whether taking the whole scope and wording of the neutrality act of 1818 into consideration, which indicate that it was apparently designed only for cases within the territory of the United States, and that at the time it was passed, the question of extritoriality was nearly unthought of, and not found in treaties, its provisions are applicable to these eastern countries. The sixth section contains the clauses which seem to link the act with proceedings like those of Mr. Cassell; but in this, it has been asserted, the intent of the framers by using the word "jurisdiction" was plainly to include ship-board, and not foreign countries like China where Americans then were not living under their own laws. However, I do not regard the exception as a good one, and as Congress has not since passed an act such as the objectors deem necessary to cover the more modern circumstances, I think Mr. Henderson was right in quoting the act when addressing General Le Gendre. No one can assert that its general scope is inapplicable to present circumstances in maintaining the neutrality of the United States; and that is the main point.

I have entered into this analysis of General Le Gendre's protest, because it has attracted the attention of the community, and the newspapers have rather taken his side. In it he says nothing upon the point, whether war exists between China and Japan, for I suppose if he proved that there was no war, he would at once infer that people might reasonably ask what was he doing here as a special commissioner. One of the most labored articles in his favor says, speaking of engaging Americans before the war and retaining them now, "That in such a case it would no more be permitted to the United States to deny the right to Japan to retain in her service, while war is going on, the American citizens engaged before the war commenced, than it would be to demand of Japan the return of the arms, ammunition, and vessels of war, bought before the expedition to Formosa was fitted out, but used after its departure." This would doubtless be true enough if there was no treaty with China involving obligations to prevent American citizens doing this very thing.

In regard to the discharge of General Le Gendre, I have only to add that, in the absence of direct proof of his having violated the acts quoted by Consul Henderson, and the very great difficulty of procuring witnesses in China or Japan, I think that Mr. Seward acted properly in discharging him.

HIS IMPERIAL JAPANESE MAJESTY'S CONSULATE,
Amoy, August 11, 1874.

SIR: I have been informed that the Hon. Charles W. Le Gendre, a citizen of the United States, who was engaged by the Japanese government, through the United States minister in Japan, in December, 1872, in conformity with the terms of article 10 of the treaty of 1858 between Japan and the United States, and now His Imperial Japanese Majesty's special commissioner in China, was, on the 6th day of August, 1874, forcibly taken before your court by United States marines, landed for that purpose from the United States steamship Yantic, upon unknown charges, and in virtue of a warrant issued by you while he was in Amoy on his way to Foo-Chow and Shanghai on business connected with his mission; that on the day following the Hon. Charles W. Le Gendre was against his will again brought before your court; that he is now forcibly detained by you at this port and rendered unable to discharge the duties intrusted to him by His Imperial Japanese Majesty; that he has already notified you that he yielded only to force, which he was unable to resist, in suffering the violence and detention to which he is now being subjected in Amoy; and that he has strongly protested against these proceedings:

Now, therefore, I, Gosheki, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's acting consul at Amoy, find it my duty to myself to protest, which I hereby do, in the most formal and solemn manner, against this act of violence toward His Imperial Japanese Majesty's special commissioner as being a manifest infraction of the rights of nations, and contrary to the privileges and immunities which public commissioners enjoy in civilized countries.

I have, &c.,

[Inclosure 2 in No. 57.]

Mr. Henderson to Gosheki.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Amoy, August 10, 1874.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of yesterday, in which you complain of my action in arresting Mr. C. W. Le Gendre, a citizen of the United States, who you say is sent to China as a special commissioner of His Imperial Japanese Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

Although I have received no official notice of the establishment, or recognition of a Japanese consulate at this port, I will state for your information that on the 6th instant Mr. Le Gendre was arrested by me in the United States consulate upon the charge of advising, aiding, and abetting an expedition in hostility to the government of China, in violation of the laws of the United States and their treaty with China, and was at the time informed by me that I was acting under instructions from the United States legation at Peking.

I will add that I know of no provision in the treaty between Japan and the United States permitting citizens of the latter country to accept or exercise any position under the former which is inconsistent with their prior obligations to obey the laws of their own country, or so long as they remain its citizens, whereby they may deprive their government of its jurisdiction over them either in Japan or China.

The tenth article of our treaty to which you refer does not, even for a lawful purpose, authorize the employment by the government of Japan of citizens of the United States to engage in her diplomatic service, and even if it did under the treaty they would still be amenable to the laws of the United States.

However, I will forward your dispatch to the legation for decision and instructions.

I am, &c.,

J. J. HENDERSON.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 57.]

Mr. Williams to Mr. Henderson.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, August 31, 1874.

SIR: I have received your two dispatches of the 10th and 13th instant (Nos. 10 and 11,) both relating to the arrest of Charles W. Le Gendre, and inclosing copy of a protest from Gosheki, acting Japanese consul at Amoy, against this arrest, and your reply to him.

You have, in your answer to Mr. Gosheki, clearly stated the grounds of your action; and the reference he makes in his protest to the engagement of General Le Gendre, in Japan, in December, 1872, and his subsequent appointment by that government as special commissioner to China, has no strength or validity in neutralizing your jurisdiction over him. General Le Gendre is still an American citizen, and if you have reason to believe that he is violating the laws of the United States, or the treaty with China, while within your jurisdiction, you have no need to refer to any Japanese authority in taking all proper measures to restrain him.

The tenth article of the treaty between Japan and the United States relates particularly to the engagement of American citizens in a military or naval capacity, and does not speak of diplomatic service, as you observe in your answer; but neither in one nor other of these capacities can any American citizen in China be allowed to aid or abet a hostile expedition against its government as long as the United States is at peace with it. Still there is an apparent difference in the nature and objects of the two callings, and more caution and evidence are, perhaps, required before proceeding against one in an ostensibly peaceful employment than one whose profession is warlike, and his surroundings more or less hostile.

If it was found after arrest that no proof of having violated treaty obligations was produced, or not enough to detain the prisoner, he should be discharged; but it was not competent for the Japanese consul to ask for the charges, as General Le Gendre was not under his jurisdiction, and Japanese law could not interfere.

I conclude further, that there was no infraction of the rights of nations in your acts, nor anything in them "contrary to the privileges and immunities which public commissioners enjoy in civilized countries," as Mr. Gosheki expresses it. The case is no doubt a singular one, but the Japanese government will clearly understand that their employment of American citizens does not remove such persons from the paramount claim of their own national laws, wherever those laws reach. Neither does an engagement in either of the above-mentioned callings by the Japanese government, when there was no hostile expedition started against China, authorize American citizens to engage further in active hostilities under the Japanese flag, and screen themselves by their previous obligations to serve their employers, as releasing them from their duty to keep the peace with China, while within her limits.

I am, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

[Inclosure 4 in No. 57.]

Protest of C. W. Le Gendre against his arrest by the United States consul at Amoy, August 7, 1874.

Selected by the government of Japan to come to Southern China, and represent it here on a mission of peace as its special commissioner, I solemnly protest against the violence used toward me by the authorities of the United States at Amoy, in depriving me of my liberty, and forcibly and against my will bringing me before them, in virtue of a warrant, in which, in violation of all principles of law, no mention of the offense or crime of which I must necessarily be accused is mentioned.

My quality as a United States citizen, and my connection as such with the Japanese government, while the latter is engaged in carrying out a scheme of pacification within the boundaries of aboriginal Formosa, cannot be invoked (as it may ultimately be) by the United States authorities in justification of their act, for the very nature of the duties which I have come here to perform entitles me to certain privileges and immunities which both China and western powers are bound to respect; and by depriving me of my liberty, while thus vested with this character, this court has committed toward Japan an unfriendly act, which that country cannot fail to resent, and which, in the course of time, the United States, in their well-known policy of justice, will certainly regret.

While as a public officer of Japan, I turn my eyes toward the United States and protest against the wrong which I am now made to suffer, and for which I claim redress as a citizen of these same United States, I feel deeply grieved for the error which I believe has been committed here by this court. This error is the more apparent when we come to consider the different circumstances under which the American authorities might have been placed in their relations with me in my double capacity as Japanese officer and United States citizen. I will suppose the worst case; that is, that the late action of Japan in aboriginal Formosa constituted an act of war against China, or, as some have called it, a war without declaration.

It must be remembered that I was engaged by the Japanese government long before the Formosa mission started. Now, the treaty of 1858 between the United States and Japan says that Japan *shall have the right to engage in the United States * * * naval and military men * * * to enter its service, * * * provided that such persons shall not be engaged to act in a naval or military capacity while Japan may be at war with any power in amity with the United States*, and I do not think that this proviso prohibits Japan from employing American citizens to act in a military or naval capacity who have been engaged before Japan went to war. Neither does the act of Congress passed April 20, 1818, commonly called the "neutrality law;" for, when I accepted my present task under the Japanese government, I was without the jurisdiction of the United States.

Now we come to the act of 1860. In passing this act the object of Congress was to arm the ministers and consuls of the United States in China, Japan, and Siam with certain powers that would enable them to carry into effect the treaties with those powers, for which purpose previous jurisdiction was insufficient. It provides that "it shall be competent for each of the said ministers to issue all manner of writs to prevent the citizens of the United States from enlisting in the military or naval service of either of the said countries, to make war upon any power with whom the United States are at peace or in the service of one portion of the people against any other portion of the same people, and he may carry out his power by a resort to such force as may at the time be within his reach belonging to the United States."

However stringent this law may appear at first sight, it can have but very little bearing upon the case at issue. It is, it is true, a law of the United States, binding, so far as it goes, upon all American citizens. But the treaty of 1858 between Japan and the United States is also a law of the United States. Mr. Wheaton says: "Under the Constitution of the United States, by which treaties made and ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are declared to be the supreme law of the land, it seems to be understood that the Congress is bound to redeem the national faith thus pledged, and to pass the laws necessary to carry the law into effect." (Wheaton's International Law, section 226, page 339.) Now, we have seen that, by the terms of the treaty of 1858 between Japan and the United States, persons who retain the character of citizens of the United States and are in the service of Japan may, without blame to themselves or Japan, serve that country in a war begun after their entering the service. If so, how could Congress, which was bound under the Constitution to legislate for the purpose of carrying into effect the terms of the treaty, pass a law that would virtually set at naught the provisions of this same treaty? In vain would we agree that the law of 1860 applies to United States citizens and not to Japan. It is beyond question that Japan can claim certain privileges from the United States under the terms of the treaty of 1858. If, by depriving United States citizens of a certain proportion of their liberty in their relations with Japan and her people, either or both are debarred from enjoying these privileges, and if the enactment of the law of 1860 is the means of doing this, I say that the law of 1860 never could have been understood by the framers thereof to apply to Japan, and that it was never intended that it should. Now, we must not forget that the law of 1860 was framed chiefly because some American adventurers, notably Ward and Burgevine, had taken an active part in the troubles between the Chinese government and the Tai-Ping rebels, Burgevine having given his aid in turn to both sides. Congress was anxious to prevent, by legislation, the recurrence of such proceedings, not only in China, but in all the countries where it was likely they might again take place, and, to prevent all possible transgression of the law, this body extended the prohibition from enlisting in the service of contending parties in cases of civil wars among those nations to entering the army or navy of either of those countries while at war with some power with whom the United States have treaties of peace and amity. In what relates to China or Siam, neither of which has such a clause in her treaty as the one referred to above, this law can be carried out, but it cannot be legally enforced in the case of Japan. It could be, however, were the law to be embodied in a new treaty, but it has not been so embodied, and, until it has been, it cannot affect or modify the treaty of 1858 without the express consent of Japan in every case. In the present instance we must infer that this consent has not been given from the fact that, contrary to the stipulations of the law of 1860, but in accordance with the terms of the treaty of 1858, an American was engaged by the government of Japan to serve in connection with the Formosa mission previous to a declaration of war against either the aborigines of the island or the Chinese Empire, and the provisions of this same treaty can be invoked by both Japan and the citizens of the United States in justification of their acts in all the courts where the laws of the United States are enforced.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Amoy, June 1, 1874. (Received July 20.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that through the courtesy of Commander A. Kautz, of the United States steamship Monocacy, last week, I had the pleasure of visiting Liang Kiau Bay, in Formosa, where the Japanese forces are encamped. (See my dispatch No. 28.)

We started from Amoy on the evening of the 27th ultimo, and arrived at Takao roads at sundown on the following day, where we had intended remaining over night, but the weather was so stormy we were unable to land, and after lying at anchor some three hours, proceeded down the coast against a strong southwest monsoon, and at daylight next morning anchored at Liang-Kiau Bay. This bay is formed by a small curvation in the shore-line, and affords not the slightest protection against the southwest monsoon. Consequently a heavy sea was breaking upon the shore in front of the Japanese camp, rendering it impossible for us to communicate with them. After remaining there a few hours the storm became more violent, and vessels in the harbor began to drag their anchors. Commander Kautz, thinking it unsafe to remain, and that we could not land for several days, put to sea, and returned to Amoy, where we arrived on the evening of the 30th.

* See instruction No. 424 to consul-general at Shanghai.

However, while at Liang-Kiau, we communicated with the British gunboat Hornet, and from her officers and other reliable sources I learned the following facts:

Japanese land forces now there number about three thousand. The Japanese corvette Nashin, and transport Shaftesbury at anchor in the bay, and the Japanese gunboat Wooshin and six other vessels, had been there but were gone. These vessels are nearly all commanded by citizens of the United States.

On the 23d the Japanese skirmishers had an engagement with the natives, and report sixteen savages killed, with six Japanese killed and thirty wounded.

The Japanese have the cordial co-operation of the Chinese at Liang Kian.

The Chinese corvette Yang Boo and gunboat Fusing visited Liang Kian on the 23d ultimo.

Although I have no official information from any source that Americans are taking part in these operations, I know personally that Lieutenant-Commander Douglas Cassel, U. S. N., and three or four other citizens of the United States, accompany the expedition.

I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of a dispatch, and translation of same, which I received on the 30th ultimo from the Chinese Taotai at this port, and respectfully request instructions as to course to pursue toward citizens of the United States implicated.

It will doubtless be remembered that these savages have heretofore been treated as an independent people, not only by foreign governments, but by the Chinese themselves, who have not hitherto pretended to claim that part of the island where the savages reside, or in any manner be responsible for their conduct. (See Consul Legendre's dispatch No. 13, of February 20, 1868, from the board of trade at Foochow to him, dated February 7, 1868.)

It is to be hoped that this affair will, at least, settle this question of responsibility for the future.

Although the Japanese have landed at a place occupied by Chinese, they claim it is by the express permission of the imperial government at Peking.

If the difficulty between China and Japan should assume a more formidable shape before I receive instructions to do otherwise, I will enjoin upon American citizens in Formosa the observance of the strictest neutrality.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 30.—Translation.]

Tautai Tin to Mr. Henderson.

I have the honor to inform you that on the 8th day of the 4th moon of this year, (23d May,) I have received a dispatch from the board of trade at Foo Chow, stating that on the 30th day of the 3d moon of the same year (15th May) a dispatch was received by them from Viceroy Li, of the Fuh Keen and Che Kiang provinces, which says that on the 23d day of the 3d moon of the same year, (May 8,) his excellency had received a dispatch from the Japanese commander-in-chief, dated the 27th day of the 2d moon, (April 16,) which says as follows :

"From time immemorial the savages of Formosa have always been in the habit of killing and plundering, and should they find any person cast ashore or in danger they become very happy, and not long ago several of my countrymen, who encountered bad weather, being driven on that shore and endangered, were massacred by them.

"Now, my government having appointed me commander-in-chief to penetrate into the savage country, summon their headmen, show them kind feelings in every way, open their hearts, discuss the points, and demand the surrender of the savages who have committed the murder, and have them punished, so as to show good example to others and prevent a repetition of the offense hereafter ; also, to protect future passers-by ; therefore I take my country soldiers with me to go by sea to the savage country at Formosa, and to inform you of my proceedings."

I also inclose another writing, which says that—

"Sixty-six Loo Choo islanders, when passing Formosa, were shipwrecked on that coast, and fifty-four men were plundered and killed by the Bawtan tribes, and only twelve escaped.

"Another party of men belonging to Pee-chung Chin, named Leepah, and three others, were also wrecked on that coast and plundered by the Pilam tribe, but the lives of the four men were spared. My government, therefore, send a commissioner to proceed to the spot, to conquer their hearts, and to make them comprehend human nature better and show good feelings toward others.

"I take soldiers with me as a precaution in case of emergency ; that is to say, should they refuse to come to terms with us or endanger our persons, then we cannot help ourselves, and we would be compelled to chastise them a little, which we are bound to do, &c." (Here ends the Japanese dispatch.)

Now the Viceroy says :

"I have examined into this affair, and find that the whole island of Taiwan has figured a long time in the map of my country ; that although the natives consist of savages and half-castes, they have for upward of two hundred years resided and subsisted themselves in that territory, like Kwangtung, Kwangsoo, Hoonan, Hoopet, Huenan, and Kweichow, which have savages as well, and are called Yiao, Tung, Miao, and Lee, yet they are all in Chinese territory from time immemorial.

"According to ancient history these territories belong to China, and although the savages inhabit the high mountains, their nature like wild beasts, and civilized law not having been able to reach them, nor are we taken notice of by them, yet they reside within the dominions of our territory and are our subjects.

"I have also examined into the international laws, and find that any living or moving object or inhabitants, no matter whether born in the land or come from abroad, are amenable to the laws of the country they reside in. Fasheal says that anything in the country of any nation belongs to that nation. He also says that any territory discovered or conquered by any nation, and so recognized by treaty, no matter whether it was done fairly or not fairly, and so held for a long time, no person has any right to question whether it belongs to them or not. He further says that every nation should attend its own business and mind its own duty.

"I have examined the above facts and find that Formosa actually belongs to China ; therefore, Chinese laws should be administered to its people, and there is no occasion to allow any other nation to interfere with our duties.

"The Japanese commander-in-chief states in his dispatch that the savages at Formosa had killed harmless people and endangered them, and that he had received orders to proceed to the savage territory and punish the principal guilty party life for life, also to teach them a lesson for the future, because they are very wicked and have been always killing harmless people.

"According to the laws of China they must be punished. Formosa belonged to China a long time ago. The Japanese government, without consulting the Tsungli Yanien as to how and in what manner the affair is to be settled, sends a commander-in-chief and troops at once to that place. This is against international law, and does not agree with the first and third articles of the Japanese treaty with China, which was ratified on the tenth year of Tung Tchi.

"And now, after carefully examining everything, we find that the first part of the Japanese dispatch says that they will send for the savage chief, to open their hearts and persuade them not to repeat the offense. Again, and that although they take a commander-in-chief and soldiers to Formosa, it is merely to be prepared in case of an attack by the savages and to punish them.

"The meaning of the Japanese commander-in-chief is only to punish the principal savages who were implicated to prevent future troubles, and there is not the least intention to go to war with China.

"With regard to the two complaints already made by the Japanese, the one relating to the Pie-chung-chin men, I have to remark, that none of the men were hurt, and that they were handed over to the authorities who had sent them to the Japanese consul at Shanghai, through deputies appointed by me, and thus they were restored to their homes.

"Some time ago I ordered the Taotai and Deputy at Formosa to erect watch houses and gates from Pang Liao to Liang Kiao, and soldiers and volunteers were stationed all along, in order to protect foreigners and others who may be cast away on that inhospitable shore. Certainly, after this, any Japanese merchantman passing to and fro that coast will not be molested.

"Last year when the Pee-chung-chin men were driven there nobody got hurt. This is a proof.

"The Loochoo Island is tributary to China, and is called by the Chinese "Choing San." Both the king and inhabitants have full respect toward China. I value their lives equally as my people, and have given special orders to the Chinese authorities to make the savages responsible, and to deliver the men who have done wrong and have them punished, life for life.

"Finally, I say that Formosa belongs to China, and it is the Chinese who have to manage their own affairs. There is no necessity to allow the Japanese to act in any way for us.

"All the foreign ministers at Peking will concur with me, and say that the remarks made by me are quite reasonable.

"I have also addressed the Japanese commander-in-chief in the same day, and requested him to take his troops back to his country, and act in accordance with treaty.

"I have also addressed in the same day the board of trade at Foochoo, to notify the public in general.

"On the 28th day of the 3d moon (13th May) the board of trade received a letter from the superintendent of customs, Tartar General Wooing, stating that on the same day, (13th May,) through the war department, by "fire-post," a secret communication was received from the Tsung li Yamen, copied from an official memorandum by Her Britannic Majesty's principal Chinese secretary, Mai, and by him personally handed to the Tsung li Yamen. It says as follows:

"Whenever one party goes to war with another party, foreign nations are not allowed to work underhand by assisting them.

"I am now given to understand that the Japanese have hired foreign vessels to convey their soldiers, &c., and I, minister, wishing to preserve public interests, ought to investigate into the matter.

"There are four rules to be observed. Rule 4 says as follows:

"As the Japanese have proceeded to China, and landed on Chinese territory, I make a particular rule, that is: If my country's subjects should save the Japanese, and help them by their power and influence, no matter whether it is my government's duty to prevent them or not, or whether the Japanese have the approbation of the Chinese government or not, my government will give explicit orders when things assume another aspect. British subjects can serve neither the Japanese nor Chinese government. This will be fair and just. Were I to give notice just now, it will cause the Japanese and Chinese to break friendship. I have plainly given orders to my respective consuls not to notify to the people as yet before they hear from me again.

"Should British subjects have anything to do with this affair, the consuls are to discourage them, and prevent them from having anything to do with it." (Here ends the viceroy's dispatch.)

Now, says the board of trade:

"That on receipt of this dispatch they wrote to the Taotai, and requested him to communicate its contents to the Chinese local authorities and the nearest consuls."

Now the Taotai says:

"I have before this received instructions from the viceroy on the subject, when I made up my mind to address you, but as I have again received a dispatch on the subject, I do so now, and beg to request you that, should you find any of your countrymen interfering in this affair, you will please stop them, and thus preserve friendship, which is very important.

No. 156.

Mr. Henderson to Mr. Davis.

No. 31.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,

Amoy, June 3, 1874. (Received July 20.)

SIR: Since sending my dispatch No. 30, with reference to the Japanese invasion of Formosa, I had a long conversation with the Chinese admiral and Taotai at this port on that subject, and particularly the complicity of certain prominent Americans in the affair. The Taotai thought it a matter of common notoriety that Americans were taking part, and a very active one, too; and remarked that it had frequently been stated in the newspapers that the expedition had been concocted and was being managed by Americans. They professed to regard America as China's oldest and truest friend, and thought justice and good faith demanded that our Government should at once prevent its citizens from taking any part in the performance. The admiral made a special request that I would do what I could to bring about an amicable settlement of the trouble that would be just and honorable to China.

I cannot help thinking it a little unfortunate, for appearance' sake at least, that citizens of the first Government in the great family of nations, just now trying to teach China international rights and obligations, should be about the only foreigners implicated, and especially that so many of them, until quite recently, held responsible positions in our civil and military service, and particularly that one of them is now a lieutenant-commander in our Navy.

I assured them that it had always been the pride of the United States to maintain a scrupulously impartial neutrality in difficulties between other nations in which they had no concern, and that, when apprised of any unlawful conduct on the part of either their officers or citizens in China, it would inquire into the matter and do justice; but as yet I had no certain information that Americans were taking any part in the transaction, other than that of innocent observers; that I had been over to Formosa to see for myself what was going on, but the weather was so stormy I was obliged to return without landing; and, until I received the Taotai's letter on the subject, a day or two ago, I was not aware that China claimed the savage territory at all, and had been so informed by a high officer in their service; that, besides all this, it had frequently been stated in newspapers that the Japanese had gone to Formosa with the express consent of the government at Peking. They both claimed to have authority from Peking to declare the latter report untrue.

The character and sources of the information I have received about this affair, until within the last four or five days, has not seemed to justify me in taking any official notice of it; and, judging from what I know of the history of Formosa and its savage inhabitants, I was disposed to believe that China had given permission to the Japanese to go there and punish the savages, and really supposed she would be glad of it, if they had to be punished at all. But after what developed in the conversation yesterday, I concluded this morning to telegraph to the legation for instructions as to the course to pursue toward Americans implicated, and did so.

I have, &c.,

J. J. HENDERSON.

[From The Daily Press, Hongkong, June 2, 1874.]

THE WAR IN FORMOSA.

(From our special correspondent.)

JAPANESE CAMP, Langkiaou, May 21, 1874.

Langkiaou, where the Japanese are encamped, is a small plain, one or two square miles in extent and surrounded by hills, on the west coast of Formosa, about ten miles from the South Cape, and forty miles from Takow. There are a few Chinese villages in it. Communication with the north is generally by junk, as the path through the hills is not safe from attack.

The Japanese have lately been busily occupied in changing the position of their camp. The old one was on an open level plain, that answered capitally till the rain began to fall, when the unfortunate soldiers found themselves sleeping literally in water. The new camp is on a line of sand-hills nearer the shore, and less regular, but far more healthy and comfortable. In spite of the work and the rain, a few small parties have managed to get away into the bush to try their breech-loaders on the savages. Two or three men have thus fallen on both sides. On one occasion such a large party of savages jumped out upon six Japanese that they had to run, leaving one of their number on the ground. His head now decorates some savage hut. Let us hope that it will be the only trophy of the kind that the savages will gain in the war. The tribe against whom proceedings are carried on are supposed to be the actual murderers of the Lewchewans, and are called the Bawtan, or the "peony" savages.

There are two American officers here, Commodore Cassell and Colonel Wasson. Such, at least, is the rank which they bear while serving the Japanese. They seem to have had hitherto, in an unofficial way, the general direction of the expedition; and, unless they belie their reputation, they will do good service in the war. These two gentlemen the other day went, unattended by an escort, to a neighboring savage village to see the chief. It had been agreed that they should meet in the open country; but, the savages not appearing, the officers went on to the village. This was an act requiring more nerve and real courage than some dashing exploit on the battle-field. A peaceable arrangement was made, which included all the villages south of Langkiaou except one, which is to be punished for some act of hostility.

MAY 22.

This morning early the later sleepers among us were awakened by a salute of several guns. This announced the arrival of General Saigo, the commander-in-chief of the expedition. He came in the Delta, which also brought 1,200 troops. A Japanese gunboat came in at the same time, and an hour or two afterward the Shaftesbury, with 600 soldiers, raising the number to about 2,500. Three thousand are expected in all. The Delta is said to have been bought standing, with her fittings and stores, and apparently officers as well, for they are all on board, though a new captain commands her. A fine Chinese corvette, the Yang Woo, and a small gunboat, have also come in, bringing three Chinese mandarins from Taiwanfoo to visit the Japanese commander-in-chief. With the four Japanese vessels and Her Majesty's steamship Hornet, which have been here for some days, there are, therefore, ten steamers anchored together in the bay.

A small party of troops bivouacked last night in the mountains, about four miles away. Early this afternoon two men were seen coming in wounded. At the same time about one hundred men hurried off to take part in the fighting. They were in irregular detachments, apparently without any officers. They went along at a half run as eager and delighted as possible. Many of them were carrying their two-handed swords as well as rifles. The swords are awkward enough for scrambling through the bush; but the Japanese cannot bear to leave them behind, hoping that some time or other they may come up with the savages. If they do there will be fearful work. It is a common sight to see men employing their leisure moments in sharpening and re-sharpening their sabers or sword-bayonets. They think breech-loaders are excellent weapons for fighting at a distance, but they have a most blood-thirsty longing for hand-to-hand work.

MAY 23.

We hear this morning that the result of yesterday's fight was fifteen savages and six Japanese killed on the spot. A visit to the hospital showed ten wounded men there, one, and perhaps two, mortally hurt. The Japanese brought in all their men who were killed, and cut off and carried back the heads of the savages, which, however, were immediately buried. One of the savages killed was a chief, and in his pouch was found a quantity of percussion-caps; but he was fighting with a matchlock. The work was severe. The savages generally waited under cover, rising up suddenly and firing first, and then running away to take up a fresh position. In one place a slight stockade was erected across a ravine, and a stand was made there. The Japanese are extremely brave. The only fault to be found with them is that they are too regardless of their own lives, preferring to rush in rather than to adopt the savage tactics, and make the most of the cover.

The Chinese inhabitants are both delighted and astonished at this slaughtering of their enemies. They are on excellent terms with the Japanese, who, with equal justice and wisdom, pay well for everything they want. The Chinese do not well understand the big copper coins, but thoroughly appreciate the new silver currency.

The Chinese mandarins came on shore to-day, at noon, to see the commander-in-chief. They were received by a guard of honor of two hundred soldiers. The visit was very short. It is not known what passed. The mandarins were not of sufficiently high rank for the Japanese to be willing to discuss anything of importance with them; and probably not much took place beyond an interchange of compliments.

We are having a sample of Formosa weather. In the morning, though the sea was quiet, still there was a surf which rendered care necessary in landing. This afternoon, in an incredibly short space of time, such a sea has got up that the two small gunboats are rolling almost gunwales under, and communication between the shore and the ships is a matter of real difficulty. Cloudy weather, with a mixture of drizzling rain and heavy down-pour, render fever and ague a too probable contingency.

The Japanese commanders do not want to have any more fighting for two or three days, fearing to frighten the enemy away. They wish to wait till they can attack from several quarters at once, and so have a chance of preventing the escape of the savages.

The Nepaul sails to-night for Nagasaki.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have received an official dispatch from the Chinese authorities of this province, informing me that the island of Formosa is a part of the Chinese Empire, and that the Japanese armed forces now at Liang Kian have entered that island in violation of law and their treaties.

They request me to prevent citizens of the United States from having anything to do with the affair, and say that they have demanded that the Japanese evacuate the island at once. I suppose there is no doubt but there are some Americans engaged in this business, and if so it is probably in opposition to the laws of the United States and our treaty obligations with China; and as United States consul charged with the execution of those laws and obligations over there, I respectfully request your co-operation and assistance in compelling them to desist.

If this suggestion accords with your sense of duty, we can hereafter determine what mode of procedure we will adopt.

Amoy and the Dependencies thereof, June 6, 1874.

Whereas the Chinese authorities of the Foh-kien province have informed me that a Japanese armed force has invaded the island of Formosa; that that island is a part of the Chinese Empire, and have requested me to prevent American citizens from taking part in the enterprise; also, that they have demanded of the Japanese forces its immediate evacuation; and

Whereas citizens of the United States in China are under the protection and subject to the jurisdiction and laws of their own country:

Now, therefore, I, the undersigned consul, charged with the care of American interests and the execution of the laws of the United States and treaty obligations with China in the island of Formosa, hereby notify and command all citizens of the United States to at once withdraw, and hereafter abstain from all enterprises unfriendly to the Chinese government, and to avoid all acts which are inconsistent with the said laws and treaty obligations.

Any citizen of the United States who shall refuse to comply with, or offend against, the provisions of this notification, shall forfeit the protection of the American Government.

SIR: The telegram which I had the honor to dispatch to you on the 8th instant was sent at the earliest moment after I had received positive information that Mr. Cassel was in the service of the Japanese. It now appears that Dr. Williams had an earlier intimation of this fact from Mr. Bingham, and he has acted in the matter in such manner as to indicate that I am not singular in my opinion that Cassel should be withdrawn from the expedition. In order that you may see exactly what Dr. Williams's view is, I transmit herewith a copy of two dispatches of his, dated, respectively, the 5th and 8th of June; the former to Mr. Henderson, the other to myself.

I have transmitted the substance of Dr. Williams's dispatch to Mr. Henderson by telegraph.

I have not received an answer from you to my telegram of the 8th instant. If such shall come, instructing Mr. Cassel to withdraw, it will save all questions with him and be a source of gratification to the Chinese. If it shall not come, Dr. Williams's instructions will probably accomplish all that is necessary.

There is no late news from Formosa. The most interesting matter since I last addressed you is contained in the inclosed translation of a dispatch from the imperial commissioner at Foo-Chow to the officer commanding the Japanese expedition.

[Newspaper extract from North China Daily News of June 14.]

Fukien, Viceroy, to Japanese General.

A dispatch from the viceroy of Chekiang and Fukien to the general in command of the Japanese forces in Formosa.

In reply to your dispatch, informing me that you had received imperial orders to land an army to admonish and punish the Seng Fan (unreclaimed aborigines) of Formosa, I had some time since the honor to reply thereto, requesting that you would withdraw your troops, bringing forward citations from international law in support of my demand.

Subsequently, on the 12th day of the 4th moon, I received information from the military intendant that the troops under your command had encamped themselves in the neighborhood of the stockade-town of Lang-chian-chai, in Fung-shan-hsien, and had engaged in a fight with the unreclaimed aborigines dwelling on Chinese soil. The intendant had deputed the "peace-reclaiming" Lieutenant-General Chen-chun-pang and the acting "Formosa-defense" Prefect Chwan-i-li, and others, to repair with all speed to the scene. On the 8th they had an interview with you, inquiring as to whether my first dispatch had reached you or not. You replied in the affirmative, and, further, mentioned that the expedition was based on the agreement made last year between the Fuh-Tan, minister of your great country, (So-ee-si-ma,) and the Tsung-li Yamen; also that an ambassador was at present being sent to Peking, to deliberate specially on the matter. That when instructions came from the capital a reply would be given; in the meanwhile the troops could not be withdrawn.

Further, on the 7th day of the 4th moon I received information that the consul for your honorable country at Amoy had visited the above-named military intendant, and personally informed him that the army would proceed to Lang-chian, for purposes of observation, and that your vessels of war would not be permitted to interfere with or give trouble to Chinese subjects, in order that the friendly relations of the two countries might be maintained. The intendant inquired as to the cause of this military movement, to which the consul replied that it was intended merely to give a slight admonitory warning and punishment to the aborigines, and that no violence would be done to Chinese soil.

The writer, on receipt of this information, was deeply impressed with the solicitude of your government to preserve the harmony of the two countries and to strengthen the bond of friendship previously existing. On hearing also that your sovereign's orders were couched in cordial terms toward China, being anxious by sinking all petty differences, to preserve the eternal friendship of the two nations, he (the writer) was further overjoyed beyond expression. Other reflections, however, compel me to convey to you intimations of a different character.

The treaty established between your honored country and my own is of recent date, and it was hoped that it would lead to amicable relations between us as limitless as the heavens and the earth. But in regard to this expedition, you are instructed by your sovereign to lead an army on territory under the dominion of China, and on soil subject to my government; while no instructions whatever have reached me from Tsung-li Yamen in regard to the matter. The movement on your part proceeds purely from lightly believing floating reports, and wrongly considering that the "Seng-fan" are not subject to Chinese control. Your action is in breach of international law, and in dereliction of the amicable treaty just established. The public opinion of China and foreign countries will necessarily proclaim you in the wrong.

Besides sending a copy of my first dispatch, I have now the honor to bring forward various unmistakable proofs, the result of investigation; firstly, of China's title to the territory in question, and secondly, of the breach of international law and treaty stipulations of which you are guilty.

That the "Lang-chian" tribe—people, property and land—are under the control of China, there are various and incontrovertible proofs. I bring forward three.

1. Eighteen tribes of Southern Lang-chian have heretofore been tributary to the Fung-shan-shien. They pay each year "Fan" taxes to the extent of over 20 Tes, as the records of Fung-shan will show.

2. In Formosa are established two prefects of the north and south divisions with the sole duty of administering the "Fan" affairs. These officers each year repair to the interior and reward the Seng Fan with salt, cloth, and other articles.

3. Stockade City (Lang-chian) is also termed "Fuh-an-chieh;" in it is erected a monumental temple to the Minister and Duke Fuh-Kung Kang of our dynasty.

The proofs are numerous and irrefragible; the only thing is that, in consequence of difference of habits, our country has not yet been able thoroughly to bring the people within the pale of the law.

In reference to the treaty entered into between our countries, clause No. 3 says: The government affairs and laws of both countries have similarities and differences. Each nation is independent, and must not encroach upon or interfere with the affairs of the other. Now in regard to Formosa, "Seng Fans," they have been long tributary to China; that they have not been completely brought within the pale of the law is a question of administration; but according to treaty it is for China to regulate it, and your honorable country is not justified in interfering. Moreover, clause No. 1 states that the territories subject to each country shall not be encroached upon by the one or the other, but must be maintained inviolate by each respectively. Again clause 14 runs as follows: "Certain ports are laid down (for trade.) Japan shall not fight with her enemies at these ports, or in the adjacent seas." Since you are not permitted to fight with enemies in seas adjacent to China, your fighting actually on our territory and with our tributary tribes, would be naturally the more unjustifiable.

By disembarking and encamping, as you now have done, your troops in the neighborhood of Lang-chian, "Chai" town, where we have established border outposts, and by engaging in warfare with the "Fan" people, who have been in the habit of paying taxes to us, you are at variance, from beginning to end, with every article of the treaty. Presuming that another country were, in imitation of the example now started by your honored country, without previous consultation, to deliberately and suddenly order its generals to lead their armies, seize your soil, and kill your people, would your honorable country, I would ask, quietly submit to the act without question? If you will but only reflect you will, I am convinced, at once see the error of your ways.

According to information obtained from the military intendant of Formosa, I learn that you (the general in command) and the diplomatic-agent, Chin-Cheng, state that, at an interview between your ambassador and the Tsung-li-Yamen at Peking last year, it was mentioned that the "Seng Fan" were not tributary to China, that this expedition was then discussed, and is now being carried out in accordance thereto. It will be found that in the case of all treaties hitherto established between China and other countries high ministers and ambassadors, each accredited with full powers, have, in accordance with their respective imperial instructions, arranged the terms of the treaty containing a special article making known the accredited powers held by each. The ministers on both sides affix their seals and signatures to the covenant, but not until the imperial signatures of both countries are added is the treaty finally published, or does the same come into force. Now, in respect to the assertion that the matter had already been agreed to by the Tsung-li-Yamen, was an agreement or treaty drawn up in accordance with the rules established in such matters? Were the seals affixed thereto, or have you no official letter, a proclamation, or any interchange whatever in writing, by which to attest your statements? On my part, I have received no intimation of any kind from the Tsung-li-Yamen, but I presume that you, when receiving orders to conduct a distant campaign, must have been instructed minutely on all subjects. If, therefore, a covenant was really entered into at the time mentioned, I beg that you will give me a draft-copy of the stipulations entered into, and it will then be my duty to allow you to act in accordance thereto. But if at the period named no written proof of a satisfaction was drawn up, it becomes my duty to request that you will withdraw your troops, return to your country, and no longer encamp your soldiers on territory under the sway of China, in order that treaty obligations be conformed to.

It would appear that your government, in consequence of the "Seng-Fan" having on two occasions killed and molested subjects under distress, has therefore ordered this expedition to enter the Fan country, to execute the parties implicated, and thus to insure a non-repetition of former atrocities. In regard to the first, it is a case of subjects of our own tributary county of Chung Shaou (comprising Sin-Chin) meeting with disaster at sea and being murdered by the Seng-Fan. This is a matter concerning the writer, whose duty it is to order the mandarins of the locality to deal severely with the case; there is no necessity for you to interfere. In regard to the other four subjects, Lipah and others of your province of Peichung, who were merely robbed and not murdered, this is also a case for me to deal with, according to the eighth article of the treaty, stating that cases of robbery, &c., are to be inquired into and judged by the local authorities. Strict injunctions will be given to the said officers to apprehend and punish the guilty parties with the same equity as if Chinese had been the victims. The officers will be open to censure in the event of remissness, and no fear need be entertained of their trifling with instructions. There is, therefore, no necessity for your troops to weary themselves, and entail expense by a protracted stay in Formosa.

In thus addressing you again, expounding in incisive terms the obligations of treaty stipulations, I am influenced by a desire to preserve the harmony of our two nations.

Your present action, considered from the light of ambassadors of all foreign countries residing at Peking, down to the public opinion of the people of China and foreign countries, will be condemned as unjustifiable, and I feel convinced that with the interest of your country at heart, you will, when aware of the error committed, at once change your schemes and withdraw your soldiers to your own country, in order to avoid the censure of the world and to preserve amity between our countries. An important dispatch.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Henderson.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, June 5, 1874.

SIR: I have been credibly informed that two American citizens, Douglas Cassel and James R. Wasson, reported to me also as holding commissions in our navy and army, are actually engaged in an armed expedition sent by the Japanese government to punish certain acts of violence committed some time since by the aborigines living in the island of Formosa, upon the crew of a vessel under the Japanese flag; and that both of them have left Japan to aid in the purpose thus openly declared of landing in Formosa.

So far as I can ascertain the consent of the Chinese government has never been formally asked or obtained by the Japanese government to land anywhere in the island of Formosa for the purpose of punishing the aborigines, a region which is claimed by the Chinese as an integral portion of their dominions, and has been so acknowledged by all nations.

I have just heard that part at least of the expedition put in at Amoy for supplies, and after remaining awhile sailed for the southern end of Formosa, where an unopposed landing was effected. Some acts of violence were, it is said, committed by the Japanese upon the unoffending inhabitants or aborigines in that region, which, it is admitted, is not the part of the island where the alleged outrage on the shipwrecked crew was perpetrated.

However this may be, for my information is not precise, this enterprise of the Japanese within the territory of the Emperor of China is one which is not recognized by this Government, and therefore one which no citizen of the United States can lawfully aid, as it is in violation of the peace which now exists between this and his own government. Even if these two men are employed in the military service of the Japanese, that does not permit them to engage in what must now be regarded as an unlawful proceeding, even if it is not really a filibustering expedition.

This being the case, as far as I am now informed, I wish you, as soon as you can, to warn Mr. Cassel and Mr. Wasson that they are doing acts in violation of the peace existing between the United States and China, and require them to desist immediately, and retire from the expedition, under penalty of arrest and trial for those acts. They will not pretend that they have the consent of their own government, or any of its officers, to aid in hostilities with China, but it may be they have been told that the expedition is not really against China, because she does not exercise jurisdiction over the whole of Formosa, and these aborigines always have been quite independent of her control, and it is in their territory only that the Japanese intend to land. These ideas cannot now be alleged in excuse, if it be true that the Japanese government has itself countermanded the expedition for reasons best known to itself.

The appointment of Chin Pao-ching as imperial commissioner to go to Formosa to arrange this affair will, I hope, be a wise selection, and that he will adjust all difficulties; but you will give this warning to Mr. Cassel and Mr. Wasson, and to any other Americans who may be connected actively with the expedition, if they are within your jurisdiction.

I am, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

*Mr. Williams to Mr. Seward.*LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, June 8, 1874.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 30th ultimo, No. 366, with inclosures of copies of a letter from Minister Bingham, and your circular letter to the southern consuls, both relating to the Japanese expedition to Formosa.

I received a letter from Mr. Bingham of the same date as yours, and have informed the foreign office of his action in stopping the steamer New York, and urging the Japanese government to detach the American officers engaged in the expedition. The information respecting this whole affair in their possession was somewhat erroneous, and they were under the impression that the New York was a man-of-war, and Messrs. Le Gendre, Cassel, and Wasson were the leaders and commanders of the expedition.

I inclose a dispatch for Mr. Henderson, of Amoy, which may strengthen your circular in showing that the enterprise Mr. Cassel and Mr. Wasson are engaged in, is one which they cannot lawfully aid. I trust they will have already left it before the dispatch reaches Amoy.

The Chinese government will be much re-assured to learn that the United States authorities are determined to take all proper measures to restrain Americans from assisting this Japanese invasion of Formosa, consistent with treaty obligations; but they have exhibited so much hesitation in their action that they have missed the full effects it would have had upon the local officials at the ports, if these latter had early been informed how the expedition was regarded.

I think their own want of precise information had something to do with their inaction, and I made it a reason for urging them to set up a telegraph-wire between the capital and southern provinces, by which they could learn such things sooner. It will be the most intelligible argument to them for encouraging the telegraph, when they begin to see their awkward position in an affair like this, because they have it not.

SIR: Referring to Mr. Henderson's dispatch, No. 32, I have the honor to inform you that his notification appeared to me to indicate a failure to appreciate our responsibility in this matter of the Americans connected with the Japanese expedition, and of the law applicable as a remedy. I therefore addressed him a letter, copy of which I inclose.

At a later moment the inclosed telegrams have passed between Mr. Henderson and me. I have no idea that the request indicated in Mr. Henderson's message was made only to him, and I do not believe that any good would have come of his interference.

Shanghai, June 17, 1874.

SIR: I have received for transmission to Washington your dispatch No. 32, inclosing copies of letters which have passed between Commander Kautz and yourself, and a copy of your notification of the 6th of June.

It occurs to me that the final clause of your notification is not sufficiently stringent. As the Chinese government has by treaty yielded up jurisdiction over our people so that it cannot punish them even by fine, it is obligatory upon us to deal with them. In this connection I refer you to a dispatch of Mr. Marshall to Mr. Marcy, of November 25, 1853; the same to Mr. Cunningham of November 1, 1853; Mr. Cushing to Mr. Marcy September 19, 1855, and Fitz Roy Kelly and James Stephen, opinion, May 22, 1862.

And in regard to the actual provisions of law violated by our people in entering the service of the Japanese upon this expedition, I refer you to the act of 20th April, 1818.

For all practical purposes quoad Americans, the jurisdiction of the United States is extended to all parts of the Chinese Empire, and that act may, I think, be as rigidly enforced in China as within the territory of the United States.

What I write to you in these matters is of course advisory only, and always subject to revision by the legation.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Amoy, June 23, 1874. (Received August 16.)

SIR: On the 19th instant I received a visit from the Chinese Admiral Lec, and Taotai Chain, of Foochow, the latter bringing me a letter from the Viceroy on the Formosan difficulty, an extract from which is herewith inclosed.

Their business was to thank me for the friendship I had manifested, as they said, towards the Chinese government in ordering Americans to withdraw from the Japanese expedition to Formosa; to see if some further action would not be taken on their cases, and especially to ask me to go to Formosa and assist them in bringing matters to a peaceable understanding with the Japanese commander-in-chief, in this connection calling my attention to the first article of our treaty of 1858. They seemed to think that Mr. Le Gendre, an American, had planned and was managing the expedition, and therefore it was my duty to assist in getting the Japanese away. I reminded him that whatever Mr. Le Gendre or other Americans had to do with the affair was by authority of the Japanese government and not the United States. The Taotai, with much apparent confidence, desired my opinion on the merits of the questions between China and Japan. I replied that it would not be proper for me to express an opinion on that part of the subject; but having received instructions from the United States legation at Peking, I was now prepared to warn all Americans to withdraw from the expedition under penalty of arrest and trial for violating the neutrality laws, and as soon as an opportunity was offered I would send them word to that effect. (The admiral having promised to furnish a gunboat for that purpose, it was agreed that a messenger should be sent to Formosa to give the requisite notice as soon as a ship could be got in readiness.)

What I had done in the matter I considered to be nothing more than my duty, and I was entitled to no thanks for it. As to my going with them to see the Japanese commander-in-chief, I thanked them and the Viceroy very much for the high compliment they paid me in asking me to perform so important an office, but I thought it would be inconsistent with my official station to act in that capacity, and in no event could I do so without express instructions from my own Government. I thought it certainly the interest of every nation to preserve peace between China and Japan.

At that time I attached no particular importance to this request, but when, two days after, it was renewed by them with much importunity, with the offer to place a man-of-war at my disposal and give me every facility for comfort and convenience, I telegraphed the fact to Mr. Seward for instructions, and was advised by him to answer the Viceroy in a friendly way, but to assume no prerogatives.

I presume nothing could be accomplished by complying with their request, even if there were not more potent objections. I shall, therefore, do nothing inconsistent with a strictly neutral course.

To-day I dispatched a messenger, per China steamer, with instructions to go to the Japanese camp and serve personally Messrs. Cassel and Wasson, and any other American found taking part in the expedition, with a notice to withdraw, under penalty of arrest and trial for violating the law of neutrality.

I also inclose to each of the gentlemen named a dispatch to the same effect.

The best information I can get leads me to believe that Mr. Le Gendre has not been, and is not now, in Formosa, but he is in Japan directing the affair. The Chinese officers seem to blame him more than any other one person, and are very anxious he should be at once stopped from having anything to do with it, even as adviser.

The Japanese openly avow an intention to remain in Formosa and occupy the savage territory, and report that the greater part of its inhabitants have already surrendered to them with this understanding, but say they have no desire to interfere with that part of the island belonging to China. It is my opinion, however, that in the event of a declaration of war by China, they will, if possible, take possession of the whole place, including the treaty-ports.

I have, &c.,

J. J. HENDERSON.

The Viceroy to Mr. Henderson.

[Extract.]

JUNE 9, 1874.

Now, we have investigated this Formosa business, as well as the statements of the Taotai of Formosa, and the captain of the Yang Boo, to the effect that this expedition to the savages of Formosa has been planned by the former consul at Amoy, Le Gendre; also, one Cassel and many others were assisting, &c. We have also examined and found that Formosa has long belonged to China, and the savages are certainly under Chinese jurisdiction, and other nations have nothing to do with them. On this occasion Japan has sent soldiers to punish the savages without previous consultation with the foreign office and the Japan commander-in-chief, Hiang, without awaiting a communication from me, on his own motion took soldiers and formed a camp at Liang Kian, in entire violation both of international law and the treaty between China and Japan. We twice sent communication to Hiang, Japan, commander-in-chief, requiring him to take back his soldiers, and twice sent communication to the board of trade to be forwarded to your honorable self to be examined and acted on, all which is on file.

We have received your dispatch in which you show your desire to carry out treaty obligations, and in settling matters to preserve lasting peace and friendship, as well as you purpose to perform your duties, for all which we desire to express our hearty thanks.

We have appointed Chian, second in the board of trade, having rank of Taotai and formerly acting prefect of Foochow, to go to Amoy, and have sent a communication to Li, Admiral at Amoy, telling him to await the coming of Chian, and then with him have a consultation with the United States consul, and with him concert some plan of action. And in accordance with the provisions of article 1 of the treaty of the eighth year of Heinfung, (1858,) that the two countries shall mutually assist in preserving friendly relations, we ask your honorable self to request the Japanese commander, Hiang, to take his soldiers back to Japan.

And if in the vessels that are gone to Formosa there are any citizens aiding the Japanese, we ask you to punish those that are acting improperly, whether on land or sea, in accordance with the eleventh article of the treaty and the laws of your country.

From the time when your honorable self arrived in China you have always managed affairs in strict accordance with right; so that the streets are full of praises of yourself by rulers and people, and we ourselves are truly thankful.

Now that there are affairs in Formosa over which you are consul, you can show your friendly feelings by acting in accordance with treaty, by taking measures in connection with Admiral Li and Prefect Chian. Thus can you show friendly feeling.

We have sent a communication to Admiral Li, and also one to Prefect Chian, ordering him to go to Amoy and arrange the whole affair with you, for which purpose we give them full powers. And we request you to act with these two, not only as officials, but as friends.

Hoping thus, with best regards.

United States Consul, Amoy and Formosa.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, July 21, 1874. (Received September 11.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose to you further extracts from the North China Daily News, in regard to the Formosa expedition. Two of these are taken from the issues of the 5th and 7th of July, and give brief statements, the one by a Japanese, and the other by a Chinese correspondent, of the diverse views held in regard to the expedition. Two others are from the issue of the 14th of July. The one sets forth the strength of the Japanese navy, the other remarks upon the activity shown at the Shanghai arsenal.

The Chinese have available six vessels which have been constructed here. Four of these are gunboats of six hundred tons, more or less. Two are heavy frigates. They have also some fifteen vessels constructed at the Foochow ship-yard. These are mostly gun-vessels of one thousand tons; are all new and steam well. They have still other craft, which have been used in the different provinces for revenue purposes and in cruising after pirates. I should say, roughly, that the number of these vessels is six or eight. They are small, but would be useful in a contest with the Japanese.

In point of fact, the Chinese navy is probably to-day well able to cope with the Japanese, notwithstanding the advantage the latter have in the possession of two iron-clads. These latter are inferior vessels, imperfectly clad, and with indifferent steaming capacity.

The extract of the 15th July gives a letter from the Japanese consul at Amoy to the Taotai at that port; and that of the 17th, a letter from a foreign correspondent in Formosa, which speaks favorably of the occasion of the expedition and its management. The extracts of the 21st give some desultory information of no particular interest.

* * * * *

After Mr. Dreyer, of the telegraph company, had left Shanghai on this mission, I learned privately from Mr. Sheppard, our active officer at Tien-tsin, that the Chinese commissioner to Formosa had, among other things, recommended the establishment of a telegraph between Foochow and Formosa. This I communicated to Mr. Dreyer by telegraph, and, as a consequence, he visited Formosa, and has made a contract with the commissioner for the cable and the dependent land lines at each end. The cable will be about ninety miles long, the Formosa land line two hundred, and the Foochow end about fifty. This contract remains to be approved by the telegraph company at Copenhagen. The assent of the Chinese government has, I believe, been given already.

The present moment seems opportune for the creation of telegraph facilities between this and Peking. I have urged Mr. Dreyer to proceed thither at once, have asked Mr. Sheppard to do what he can with the Viceroy Li, and suggested the matter to Doctor Williams.

[From the North China Daily News, July 14, 1874.]

NAVAL FORCES OF JAPAN.

We are enabled to give the following particulars about the Japanese navy, taken from a statement which was drawn up by a competent authority, about the end of last year:

Rio-jio-kan, wooden corvette, screw-steamer; 280 horse-power; length, 215 feet greatest breadth, 33 feet; draught, $17\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Protected by a girdle of 4-inch iron plates, $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet above and 4 feet under the water-line, about 15 feet fore and aft being without armor. Carries 12 cast-iron rifled guns, muzzle-loaders, 10 of which have a caliber of $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches and 2 of $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches. The greatest speed of this vessel is 9 knots, and for this reason, as well as for the insufficiency of its armor, it may be a match for a wooden vessel of the same strength, but would have no chance whatever against the most ordinary iron-clad. This vessel visited Shanghai last year.

Nishin-kan, wooden corvette, screw-steamer; 250 horse-power; length, 201 feet; greatest breadth, 29 feet; draught, 14 feet; carries 6 cast-iron guns of about $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches and 1 Armstrong muzzle-loader of 7 inches. She is said to be a fast and serviceable vessel, and is, we believe, the one now in port.

Tsukuba-kan, wooden corvette, screw-steamer; 200 horse-power; length, 197 feet; greatest breadth, $29\frac{1}{2}$ feet; draught, 15 feet; carries 6 steel Armstrong guns of 5 inches, 2 cast-iron guns of about the same caliber, and 2 smaller bronze guns of native fabrication. This vessel is very old and used up; her greatest speed not more than 6 knots.

Kusuga-kan, wooden paddle-steamer; 300 horse-power; length, 243 feet; greatest breadth, 27 feet; draught, 11 feet; carries 4 bronze guns of 5 inches, 2 cast-iron guns of about the same caliber, and 1 Forbes gun of 7 inches.

Ho-shio-kan, compound-system gunboat, screw-steamer; 75 horse-power; length, 145 feet; greatest breadth, $22\frac{1}{2}$ feet; draught, 7 feet; carries 1 Armstrong breech-loader of 7 inches, 1 idem of $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and 2 small steel guns.

Mo-shuim-kan, wooden gunboat, screw-steamer, of about the same dimensions as the preceding; carries 1 Forbes muzzle-loader of 7 inches, 1 Armstrong muzzle-loader of $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and 2 smaller Armstrong guns.

Dai-itchi-Teibo-kan or Teibo I, wooden gunboat, screw-steamer, 60 horse-power; length, 132 feet; greatest breadth, 22 feet; draught, $7\frac{1}{2}$; carries one cast-iron gun of $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches; 1 Krupp gun of $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches; and 2 small steel guns.

Dai-in-Teibo-kan or Teibo II, same construction and dimensions as the preceding; carries 2 Armstrong muzzle-loaders of $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and 2 small steel Forbes guns.

Un-yo-kan, wooden gunboat, screw-steamer, about the same dimensions as the preceding; carries 1 rifled muzzle-loader of about 6 inches, 1 of about 5 inches, and 2 small Armstrong guns.

Chiotagata-kan, small wooden gunboat, screw-steamer of 40 horse-power; carries 1 breech-loader of $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and 2 small guns.

Kotetz'en, iron-clad ram, screw-steamer, with two propellers 500 horse-power, length 158 feet, greatest breadth 27, draught, 13 feet; carries 3 very large and 2 smaller guns. This ram is old and completely unseaworthy; in fact last year it was not considered as belonging to the active navy any more. As, however, it may, perhaps, still be fit for defending the entrance of a harbor, we have not felt justified in omitting it.

Latest advices from perfectly reliable sources fully confirm the unseaworthiness of this ram, and further inform us that the other so-called iron-clad, the Rio-jio-kan, is undergoing boiler repairs, which cannot be finished for a considerable time. The gunboats are said to be generally in good order.

The Japanese have, moreover, five or six transports, not at all or insignificantly armed; two of these are sailing-vessels.

As we said at the beginning, these particulars have been taken from a statement drawn up at the end of last year, but they may stand even now, as we hear that no additions of any importance have been made to the Japanese navy since that time.

The actual strength of the active navy of Japan would, therefore, be as follows:

Dispatches re Formosa.

A copy of a reply addressed to Lo Taotai at Foochow, by Mr. Fukushima, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's consul for Amoy.

AMOY, June 17, 1874.

I have the honor to inform you that I returned to Amoy to-day, the 17th of the month, from Formosa, and received your letter of the 21st of the 4th moon, (Chinese calendar,) in which you state that you had been informed by his excellency Li, the viceroy of Fohkien, on the 18th of your 4th moon, touching the subject of his excellency's official letter addressed to his excellency Saigo, commander-in-chief of the Formosan expedition, and requesting me to communicate the matter to Mr. Shinagawa, consul for Shanghai, &c. I fully comprehend the position, and beg to say that I do not consider such a matter can be treated by us, but that it is a subject for the commander alone to decide as he sees fit when he receives the viceroy's dispatch. From my personal experience in the Formosan territories, through which I lately traveled, and partly also from my opinion of the circumstances under which our commander has invested the country of the savages by special instructions from his Japanese majesty, I apprehend that there would be found some difference in the views of our commander from those entertained by the viceroy, as expressed in his excellency's letter.

For instance, as regards the territories which are occupied by aborigines, and which have long been claimed to be under the control of your government, I would remark that I put a few questions to the aborigines as to whether their territory as well as themselves had ever been subject to the sovereignty of China. They said "they had not," and substantiated their denial in an especial manner by showing that their taxes are paid only to their chief. They maintain that they have never been under the control of the Chinese government. It seems to be their custom to quarrel and even fight furiously with each other, taking possession of ground by force and robbing each other, up to the present time, there being no authority to execute impartial justice or to exercise control over them.

I would here mention an instance in which they lately applied to our commander, begging for his adjudication in a question respecting a right of property in ground, which had been contested for forty years. In disposition they seem to be amicable, though they are generally reckless and of a morose temperament, never getting rid of a sense of injury when despoiled of their property by wicked people, from whom they suffer on account of their having no proper court in which to make complaint.

They regarded therefore with extreme satisfaction the approach of our invading party. Placed as they were, it was as if they had met a light on a dark night, and they showed every kindness by helping the army to their utmost and begging protection from us, which seems to show that they were much gratified by the entrance of the invaders within their boundary, and that they preferred them to any others.

I therefore think that our commander confidently believes that those savages as well as their territories have never been under the sovereignty of your government, and under the special instructions he holds from his Japanese majesty is daily exerting his energies toward reducing them to a proper condition. His commission, however, extends only to military affairs, and is limited to the measures necessary in reference to the savages. Consequently, I think, he could do nothing in the matter, nor even discuss with his excellency the viceroy the question as to the jurisdiction of your government, over that territory, this being a subject which ought to be left to the decision of our respective governments.

From my private considerations of this affair, I would express the hope that your high commissioner or authorities will negotiate it in an impartial and amicable spirit with our minister, and thus continue our friendly relations on a permanent footing.

No. 797.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, August 11, 1874. (Received September 17.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose to you herewith a series of telegrams that have passed between the consul at Amoy and myself, showing the arrival of General Le Gendre at Amoy, his arrest, &c.

It is notorious that General Le Gendre has a special concern in the Japanese expedition to Formosa. You are aware that, during the time of his service as our consul at Amoy, he made many visits to the island. At a later moment he appeared in Japan, "having a very full and complete set of maps, charts, photographs, &c., of the coast, mainland, and people of Formosa" (Mr. De Long to Mr. Fish, No. 302, November 6, 1872.) He was then brought into communication with the Japanese government, and there followed negotiations for his employment by that government, "with a distinct reference to the use of his services as an adviser in military operations, should they become necessary." (Mr. Fish to Mr. De Long, No. 164, December 30, 1872.) The military operations here referred to would appear to be those since undertaken in Formosa, ostensibly to punish savage inhabitants of the island for alleged maltreatment of shipwrecked Japanese. This matter is thus spoken of by Mr. Low, in his dispatch No. 264, of June 13, 1873:

There are, he says, (the Japanese ambassador,) only two questions of importance which he desires to discuss with the Chinese government.

First. Whether China is responsible for the acts of the aborigines on the island of Formosa. If the government answers this question in the affirmative, he will then demand redress and indemnity for the murder of some natives of Loochoo, who were wrecked there a year and more ago. If the answer be given in the negative, notice will be given that Japan proposes to send a military force to Formosa, to chastise the savage and semi-civilized tribes that practically hold undisputed possession of a large part of the island, and, as there are no safe harbors on that part of the island where the aborigines reside, permission will be asked to land troops at one of the ports open to trade, and to march them through Chinese territory that lies between the ports and the points where the troops are intended to operate against the savages.

Second. To ascertain the precise relations between China and Corea, &c.

General Le Gendre was associated with the ambassador on this mission. (See Mr. Low's letter, No. 256, May 13, 1873.)

It has been reported that the Chinese disclaimed responsibility for the acts of the Formosan savages.

It has been reported again that they agreed to take some steps to restrain them for the future. At any rate, in the early part of this year, the Japanese set on foot an expedition to Formosa of an extensive character. My several dispatches in regard to it have laid before you all the general information which I have gathered, and will have demonstrated that it was not intended for a raid against a few scattered miserable savages.

That expedition sailed from Japan in the middle of April. The southern part of Formosa, from sea to sea, was at once occupied. The savages were encountered and beaten in conflict or driven into inaccessible mountains. Long since the ostensible purposes of the expedition were accomplished, but the Japanese still remain. They have put up houses of such description as warrant the belief that they are intended for permanent occupation. They have constructed a few roads where their utility for military purposes is not manifest. It is said that large numbers of troops are massed near Nagasaki, ready to be moved in case of the outbreak of war. Meanwhile the Chinese, who beyond a doubt would be glad to see the Japanese evacuate the island and let the matter drop, have been in negotiation with Japan, and, as if in anticipation of war, have mobilized large forces and are everywhere preparing for war.

Of the view which the United States representative at Peking takes you are doubtless informed. I may, however, quote from his dispatch to me of June 17 last:

I suppose my instructions to Mr. Henderson have reached you in passing, and I have therein given my views of the countenance and aid which our countrymen are affording to the Japanese. It is our duty to maintain the peace existing between this empire and our own country, and these men are violating that peace, and must be restrained if it can be done. The first article of the treaty gives one of its chief obligations and its infraction by their assisting an armed invasion of Formosa needs no proof, now that the real nature of that expedition has been shown. It seems to me that all right-minded people thus engaged must now see that the Japanese are using them in carrying out hostile designs, and that their presence militates against the honor and obligations of the United States.

The persons more particularly referred to in this extract are Messrs. Cassell and Wasson, citizens of the United States, who are now actually in the Japanese camp in Formosa.

It would seem as if it had been the intention of General Le Gendre to accompany the expedition.

Under date of the 18th of May the United States minister at Tokei wrote to me as follows :

From information recently received I deem it proper to say to you that before any expedition left Japan for Formosa, or any other portion of China, viz, on the 18th and also on the 19th of April, I made written protest to the minister for foreign affairs against the employment by Japan of any ship or citizen of the United States in an armed expedition against Formosa until the written consent of China thereto should have been first obtained by the government of Japan. On the 22d of April, and while the expedition still remained in port at Nagasaki, I received from the minister for foreign affairs a dispatch, in which he said that in compliance with my request the steamer New York and Messrs. Le Gendre, Cassell, and Wasson, citizens of the United States, had been detached from this service.

What better evidence could be adduced to show that the moment for the use of General Le Gendre's services, "as an adviser in military operations," had arrived ?

Messrs. Cassell and Wasson did go to Formosa. The New York did not go. A vessel chartered from British subjects did not go, a similar notice having been sent to the Japanese government by the British minister. General Le Gendre also remained behind. Public report says that he was at Nagasaki on or about the date when the expedition sailed and engaged in promoting its departure. When the New York, a Pacific mail-steamer, was detached, he appeared at the Pacific mail agency and complained violently of her withdrawal, believing apparently that it was the act of the company. From the inception of the scheme for an invasion of Formosa on the part of the Japanese there are, then, numerous proofs to connect him with it and to establish the proposition that he has promoted it.

The first intimation that I had of his departure for the scene of operations came to me by Mr. Henderson's telegram of the 5th instant. Called upon to act promptly, lest the opportunity might be lost, I did not hesitate to advise his arrest. It remains now to determine whether there is a case against General Le Gendre which will justify me in prosecuting him for a breach of the neutrality act.

* * * * *

General Le Gendre remains at Amoy, and I am using my best endeavors and judgment to determine whether it is possible or right to hold him longer, having due regard to law and international obligations. I confess that the conclusion is forced upon me that I have no means open to me to prevent his going on to Formosa and there taking up arms against the country upon whose soil he now is.

Writing, as I do, at the last moment before the departure of the mail, and having had but little time to give to the consideration of the subject, I am unwilling to decide hastily what should be done. I should be sorry to think that you might see in my course any lack of regard for the rights of the individual. I should, however, be more sorry to fail in regard to the rights of the great empire upon whose soil I stand, and which has deputed to our Government certain duties which cannot be too faithfully and impartially discharged.

No. 409.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 26, 1874.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your dispatch, No. 766, of June 23, ultimo, referring to Mr. Henderson's No. 32, and inclosing copies of your correspondence with him concerning the assistance asked of him by the Chinese authorities in reference to the expedition to Formosa. By the same mail Mr. Henderson's No. 32, containing a copy of his notification to the Americans said to be engaged in the expedition, was received.

In your letter to Mr. Henderson you pronounce the final clause of his notification not sufficiently stringent, and refer to the provisions of the act of 1818. A copy of Mr. Henderson's notification is annexed.*

While this Department agrees that it is the obligation of this Government promptly and effectively to punish offenders against the law who may be American citizens, whether in China, or in Japan, or elsewhere wherever the laws of the United States may be enforced, at the same time there must be some actual violation of law to justify an interference.

The Government does not attempt to impose restrictions upon individual enterprise or commercial ventures of American citizens which involve no violation of law.

An examination of Mr. Henderson's notification shows it to have been issued in his official capacity as consul, on a complaint made to him by the Chinese authorities. It is addressed to all citizens of the United States, who are commanded to at once withdraw, and thereafter abstain from, all enterprises unfriendly to the Chinese government. It declares that any citizen of the United States who shall refuse to comply therewith, or who shall offend against its provisions, shall forfeit the protection of the United States.

This Department is at a loss to discover the power or right of the consul to issue a proclamation or notification of this character.

Under the provisions of the act of 1860, authority is given to the ministers of the United States in China and Japan "to issue all manner of writs to prevent the citizens of the United States from enlisting in the military or naval service of either of the said countries, to make war upon any foreign power with whom the United States are at peace, or in the service of one portion of the people against any other portion of the same people; and he [the minister] may carry out this power by a resort to such force as may at the time be within his reach belonging to the United States."

This is an extraordinary power, conferred upon the minister alone, in a certain emergency, and within fixed limits. It is conferred upon him in consequence of the extraterritorial rights reserved in the countries named in the act to the citizens of the United States. The power is given to the minister alone, and is not shared by the consul.

But the notification of Mr. Henderson is his own act, issued by him as a consul of the United States, upon a general complaint made to him by the Chinese government. As a warning and caution to his countrymen, it was a prudent and commendable notice, and, so far as it was a mere notice and caution, it is approved. But it goes much further; it is much more than a warning. In it the consul not only assumes the prerogative of the minister, but proceeds to decide in advance what acts will constitute an offense, and affixes a punishment.

* See inclosure 3 in Mr. Henderson's dispatch No. 32, ante.

Apart from the question of the power of the consul to issue such a notification in any case, it is apprehended that the notification in question, being addressed to all citizens of the United States, and commanding all to withdraw and abstain from all enterprises unfriendly to the Chinese government, might affect citizens of the United States lawfully employed by the Japanese. This Department is not advised as to the precise facts concerning the employment of each of the American citizens said to be engaged in Japanese service. Many citizens of the United States are understood to be employed in various capacities in the civil service of Japan, and it may be difficult to establish a standard to determine how far, or whether any, or which of the acts, which they may be called upon to perform in the appropriate discharge of their several engagements, may or may not be deemed friendly or unfriendly by another power. Acts and enterprises of a government may be deemed by another power to be unfriendly, and yet fall short, very far short, of acts of war, or of compromising the neutrality of the state by which they are done. The erection by a state of a fortification, or the construction of a road, may be (in fact each has been) regarded as an unfriendly act, by another power. But this will scarcely justify, certainly it will not require a third power to enjoin its citizens under severe penalties from taking employment, much less from completing engagements into which they have already entered, and lawful at the time when entered into, in such erection or construction.

This Government does not feel called upon to admit that an engagement by one of its citizens to enter into the military service of Japan, or of another foreign power, made in time of peace, when no war or hostile demonstration is in process or in contemplation, is not a valid contract or that it is repugnant to law. Where the engagement is made in time of peace and hostilities are not in contemplation, there seems to be no distinction in the lawfulness of a contract for civil or for military service.

Should a war afterward be declared, or an insurrection break out, there seems to be no good reason why such contract, valid at its inception, should not be performed, even though a new contract of the same nature could not at the time legally be made.

If the contract for service be legal it cannot be that the person so contracting can escape the burdens and dangers incident to the employment, when his services are most needed, by declaring his foreign nationality. Should he desert, or refuse to obey orders, he would doubtless be exposed to the punishment which, by the laws of all countries, attend desertion and insubordination.

Should he form part of an expedition making a hostile attack, or an invasion into the territories of a country with which that in whose service he had become enlisted has become involved in a war subsequent to his enlistment, he joins in such attack or invasion, not as an American citizen, but as a soldier in the army of one of the belligerent nations; and the United States would take no notice, as against the attacked or invaded party, should he be killed in battle in the ordinary course of civilized warfare, and, in case of his being taken prisoner, would not exact more in his behalf than that no unusual or inhuman punishment be inflicted upon him, and would only watch and require that as a prisoner of war he be treated according to the accepted rules of civilized warfare.

It is apprehended therefore that no citizen of the United States, regularly enlisted in the service of Japan in time of peace, without reference to any intended act of war, and without anticipating any hostilities, could be punished according to the laws of the United States, and that he could not by any law of the United States, upon the commencement of hostilities, be compelled to abandon the service into which he had entered, or be punished for a refusal to do so.

Foreigners enlist in the military service of nearly every power. During the late rebellion in this country very many foreigners of very many different nationalities took service, not only in the Union Army, but in that of the rebellion, and no remonstrance was made to the governments of which they were subjects, nor was their service in the insurgent army deemed a cause of complaint by this Government.

China herself has employed the services of Americans in her army, and whether against a foreign enemy or an insurrection seems to make no distinction in principle or in law, saving that our own act of 1860 alike forbids our citizens enlisting in the military or naval service of either of the powers named in the act, to make war upon any foreign power with whom the United States are at peace, or in the service of one portion of the people against any other portion of the same people.

Ward and Burgevine (both Americans) were in the Chinese military service. China did not regard their service as illegal or improper, or in violation either of public law or of treaty obligations.

It is believed, although of this I have no certain information, that the military service of China, at this time embraces a number of Europeans, and possibly some Americans.

The act of 1860 appears to have been passed to supply certain apprehended defects in the law of 1818, as applicable to Japan and China, and to provide remedies which, on account of remoteness, could not be furnished by the President under the then existing statutes.

While the Department is not prepared to say that the law of 1818 may not be in force in China and Japan, in its application to citizens of the United States within those countries, it is believed that the law of 1860 will, in most cases, supply a sufficient remedy.

Your course in advising Mr. Henderson to avoid accepting the invitation of the viceroy, as explained in Mr. Henderson's telegram, is approved.

No benefit could result from the intervention of the consul; and it is quite apparent that the Chinese government was ready to obtain the countenance and assistance of an officer in the service of the United States in enforcing its general demand that the Japanese should quit Formosa.

Such matters are entirely foreign to consular duties. A copy of this dispatch, as it relates to these general questions, has been forwarded to Mr. Henderson and to the minister of the United States in Japan, and the chargé d'affaires in China, for their information severally.

I also inclose herewith an extract of an instruction sent to Mr. Williams, No 174,* under the date of the 29th July last.

SIR: I have the honor to hand to you herewith a copy of a letter which I have received from the manager of the Great Northern Telegraph Company, together with Mr. De Lano's letter therein referred to, and an English copy of the agreement between the company and the authorities of the Fohkien province for the establishment of a telegraph between Foochow and Amoy. I hand you also copy of a letter addressed by me to Mr. Sheppard, at Tien-tsin, and Mr. Lord, at Ningpo, in regard to telegraphs. The present moment is opportune to urge these matters upon the Chinese, and I am using my best efforts to do so here and to encourage our several consuls to do the same thing.

I cannot too highly commend the action of Mr. De Lano in the case of the Foochow and Pagoda anchorage telegraph and the Foochow and Amoy line.

GREAT NORTHERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY,
Chief Office, Shanghai, August 26, 1874.

SIR: I beg to submit to you copy of a letter received yesterday from Mr. M. M. De Lano, United States consul at Foo-Chow, and also copy in English and Chinese of the agreement referred to in the same letter.

I do this in the intention of having your assistance in bringing the matter before such of the Chinese officials, and in such manner as you deem most likely to have influence and wisdom enough to see the advantages to China in adopting the agreement. I shall not enter upon any details, as the document actually speaks for itself.

If you think that the agreement is fair and likely to be approved of by other Chinese authorities, say for lines from Shanghai to Nankin, from Shanghai to Tien-tsin and Peking, or between Ningpo and Hankow, or from there to Shanghai, I beg you to make use of it for furthering the establishing of these lines, this company being willing to carry out these lines without delay; if the permission through such an agreement can be procured from the local authorities concerned.

With the trust that you will use the most expedient means to advocate this matter, which is of like interest to all foreigners in China,

I have, &c.,

DREYER.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 798.]

Mr. De Lano to Mr. Dreyer.

FOOCHOW, August 22, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: I have in a former letter informed you that on the 1st day of the present month I received the assent of the provincial authorities here to the erection of a telegraph-line from this port to Amoy, overland, by the company which you represent. On the 4th and 5th of the month one of the members of the "Tung Lan Chu" (foreign trade committee) came to my office to introduce a wan-yuan, or deputy, who had in the mean time been appointed to go over the route to Amoy in company with a representative of your company, to make the preliminary survey and sketch of the route on which the proposed telegraph-line should be erected. I introduced the said deputy to your agent, Mr. Henningsen, and it was agreed by and between them that on the arrival of the company's engineer from Shanghai, arrangements should be at once concluded for the immediate survey of the proposed route. Two or three days later your engineer arrived here, when I arranged for him an interview with the Tao-tai and other officials, on which occasion I myself accompanied Mr. Hoffmeyer and Mr. Henningsen, taking my own interpreter with me. At this interview all the details of an agreement were arranged substantially as contained in a copy herewith inclosed, which agreement was to be signed by Mr. Henningsen on behalf of the company and by the foreign trade committee as the proper representatives of the provincial officials.

It was not thought essential that this agreement should be executed before the survey should be commenced. Accordingly a second deputy was appointed, and on the 19th instant they started in company with Mr. Hoffmeyer and a large escort of attendants and coolies to make the preliminary survey, all in strict accordance with the terms agreed upon and contained in the inclosed copy of agreement.

On yesterday I sent the written agreement to the yamèn for examination and approval by the Tung Lan Chü, preparatory to its execution and signature, when I was informed that the imperial commissioner, Shen Pau Cheu, had written to the provincial official (the viceroy) to say that the Foochow and Amoy telegraph line would be built by the Chinese government in accordance with the advice of Mr. Giguel, already submitted to the central government.

I was further informed that the viceroy had replied to Shen that he had closed with the Great Northern Company to erect the line, and that by the terms of his agreement the authorities would get the use of his line for government purposes free of charge with the option of buying it at pleasure, and he advised that the agreement be carried out. However, the committee declined to sign the agreement pending further instructions; but in the mean time the party are proceeding with the survey. I submit the foregoing statement to you, leaving it to yourself to determine what shall be done in the matter, but I shall continue my efforts in the company's behalf, trusting that the provincial officials will be able to override the propositions of Mr. Giguel and assert their right to manage the affairs of their province independently of Shen.

I am sure the officers with whom I have negotiated in the matter are much annoyed at the turn things have taken, and charge the whole blame on Giguel.

They believe that if the facts were reported in the interest of your company to the central government, Shen might be instructed to step aside and the viceroy instructed to carry out the arrangement made with the company. They say also that Shen may withdraw from his project on the receipt of the viceroy's letter. I give you also a Chinese version of the agreement, so that you may have it at hand in case you decide upon any action at Peking.

Trusting the project will yet turn out favorable to your company,

I am, sir, &c.,

M. M. DE LANO.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 798.]

Copy of an agreement.

The high provincial authorities at Foochow, in the province of Fohkien and Empire of China, having already granted unto the Great Northern Telegraph Company of Denmark, permission to erect an electric telegraph line, overland, between the provincial city of Foochow and the city of Amoy, both in the province of Fohkien it is necessary, in order that a perfect understanding may be had in the matter, that all the stipulations agreed upon by the Chinese authorities and the representatives of the telegraph company be clearly stated in the form of an agreement, and made a matter of record.

1st. The Chinese authorities agree on their part that as soon as the representative or engineer of the telegraph company aforesaid shall signify his readiness to commence the survey and location of the said telegraph line, they, the Chinese authorities, will appoint two deputies, having official rank, to accompany the said telegraph company's representative from Foochow to Amoy aforesaid, and assist him in the survey of the route; the line to be erected along the route selected and agreed upon by the said deputies and the company's engineer. But it is understood that the line shall not pass through the large cities along the route, nor shall the telegraph-poles be put up in the public roads so as to obstruct travel, nor in the people's fields without their consent, neither shall any graves or tombs be interfered with. The Chinese authorities agree to give official protection to the said telegraph line during its construction and after its completion, and permit the company to lease ground and erect small watch-houses at convenient distances from each other along the route, say ten miles apart, where Chinese watchmen will be employed to guard the line, (the company to pay such rent for the ground as may be agreed upon with the owners of the same.) The company are permitted in like manner to obtain ground and erect telegraph stations at or near the two cities of Hing-Hua and Chûen-Chan, where European operators may reside.

2d. It is agreed that the provincial authorities shall not grant to any other company or person permission to erect another, or a competing telegraph line between Foochow and Amoy aforesaid, for or during the space of thirty years from the date of this agreement; the Chinese authorities reserving to themselves the right to purchase the line at any time after its completion, at the actual cost of its construction, (adding thereto interest from the date of its completion to date of purchase, at a rate per cent. to be determined and agreed upon by the Chinese authorities and the representatives of the company.) In the event of the line being purchased by the Chinese authorities, the company will not erect a competing line.

3d. The Great Northern Telegraph Company aforesaid undertake to erect the telegraph-poles along the route selected and located as aforesaid, and to place thereon two lines of wire, one of which is to be worked by the company and in the company's interest for commercial purposes, and the other shall be worked solely in the interest of the Chinese authorities and for government purposes only, the telegraph company reserving to themselves the right to control the second wire in the manner hereafter named, viz: The company will work the wire in the interest of the Chinese government until their own appointed people are able to perform the work themselves, and will supply the Chinese with office-room and instruments at Foochow and Amoy, and at intermediate stations, free of charge, and will also instruct Chinese lads appointed by the authorities in the art of telegraphy free of charge.

4th. In order that the company may be assured that only government messages are transmitted over the government wire, the Chinese authorities agree that the draughts of all messages sent by them for transmission either at Foochow, Amoy, or the intermediate stations, shall have upon them a certain official seal, and a copy or impression of such seal shall be deposited with the operator or agent at each station.

5th. It is agreed that the office or operating-room, both of the company and Chinese, shall be in the same building at Foochow, Amoy, and the intermediate stations. The poles, wires, instruments, and stations are to be the property of the company until such time as the Chinese authorities shall elect to purchase the same, as before stated.

6th. All government messages sent by the Chinese authorities, for transmission over the wire, shall be dispatched without delay, and if in any case a non-official message shall be sent by an attaché of the yamên to the telegraph-office for transmission, the Chinese will try to discover the writer thereof and punish him in a suitable manner for the offense.

The company agree that no official messages sent by the Chinese authorities shall be published by the company or any of their employés. All official messages received at the different stations for the Chinese authorities will be immediately delivered as addressed by the company.

It being the wish of the Great Northern Telegraph Company to cultivate and maintain the most friendly relations with the Chinese authorities and the people, they will be found willing to change or vary the stipulations contained herein if such change shall appear to be for the general good, and shall not materially damage their interests; and on the other hand the Chinese authorities agree to do all things convenient and reasonable to facilitate the early completion of the telegraph-line.

As a proof of the good faith of the two parties concerned in this agreement, it is signed by the company's agent, Mr. J. Henningsen, on behalf of the telegraph company, and by the foreign trade committee on behalf of the Chinese provincial authorities.

SIR: You will understand the situation at Foochow from the inclosed letter from Mr. De Lano and the inclosed copies of the agreement between the provincial authorities and the Great Northern Telegraph Company. I now, on behalf of the company and in the interests of progress and civilization, place these documents in your hands with a view to secure your aid for the company. It has been thought by Mr. Dreyer and me that the aid of the viceroy at Chibli might be useful. It is thought that there is nothing to be gained by Mr. Giguel's plan, which would not be sooner and more economically effected by the telegraph company, while, if at last, Mr. Giguel's plan is to be adopted, the provision for the purchase and sale of the line would make such course easy. I conceive moreover that it is exceedingly desirable that telegraphs shall be introduced into China in such manner as to be in a degree independent of Chinese surveillance. Having the highest opinion of your discretion I write to you in the matter, giving you, with Mr. Dreyer's consent, the fullest discretion to introduce the subject to the viceroy or not, as may seem wise to you, and if you do introduce it, to invite his aid with the government at Peking or otherwise.

You will notice that Mr. Geoffroy's proposal for the establishment of an inspector of telegraphs probably looks to the scheme foreshadowed at Foochow by the imperial commissioner, Shên.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of yesterday.

I now inclose you a copy of a document not yet formally executed, but, as I understand, agreed to by the officials at Foochow, for the establishment of a telegraph line between Foochow and Amoy.

This moment, when the Chinese fear a war and are made painfully conscious of their lack of means of resistance, including the telegraph and railroads, affords an opportunity to press home upon them their opportunities to institute these very desirable ameliorations of the means of communication. I therefore suggest to you, for your consideration, whether you can do anything so calculated to promote general interests as to visit the provincial officers at Hangchow, and submit to them the agreement mentioned, as indicating what they can do in the way of establishing a telegraph between their city and Ningpo. If you fail we are no worse off, and possibly you may succeed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 31, 1874.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 791 in reference to the delivery of a criminal named Walter Jackson to the Hong-Kong government, and inclosing a copy of a letter addressed you by J. Gardiner Austin, colonial secretary, and your reply, and also a copy of your dispatch to Mr. Williams, chargé d'affaires at Peking, is received. From the correspondence with the Hong-Kong government it appears that Walter Jackson, having been arrested in Shanghai, claimed to be an American citizen, and was delivered to you at your request; that this information being conveyed to Hong-Kong, a requisition was made upon you by letter from the colonial secretary for the delivery of Jackson, and that you informed him that while you would hold him a reasonable time to receive the evidence upon which the requisition was made, you were under no obligation to deliver the prisoner except in accordance with the provisions for the extradition of criminals as settled by treaty between the British government and the United States.

The Department is somewhat at a loss to ascertain the precise intention of the government of Hong-Kong by its demand. According to settled usage in the United States, criminals are not delivered up on the demand of a foreign state except pursuant to the provisions of a treaty. If the request of the Hong-Kong government was intended to be a demand for extradition in accordance with the provisions of the treaty with Great Britain of 1842, it is sufficient to say that the treaty provides for the delivery of persons who, charged with certain crimes committed within the jurisdiction of either, "shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territories of the other," where proper proceedings shall be taken.

It is necessary, in the opinion of this Department, that the person whose extradition is sought shall be not only within the jurisdiction, but within the actual territory of the United States. No authority is given to any diplomatic or consular officer to grant a warrant of extradition. Upon an examination of the request made by the colonial secretary, the absence of the usual statement that the prisoner is a fugitive from British justice and within the territory of the United States will be noticed, and the fact that the proceedings were dropped on the reception of your note is quite significant.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Williams.

No. 391.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, August 29, 1874.

SIR: The Tantai lately visited me, and I believe the English and French consuls on the same day, and in conversation raised the question, how far the neutrality of the foreign settlements here would, in case of war, be guaranteed by the foreign powers. In consequence of this visit I consulted with the British, German, and French consuls, and we have agreed to transmit severally to Peking, a letter which has been drafted by Mr. Medhurst, and which, as I wrote yesterday in a private note, went forward yesterday to Mr. Wade, my draft being at the moment in the hands of M. Godeaux.

I have brought the subject of this draft before the Tantai, and at a later moment Mr. Medhurst has communicated the same to him in writing. I understand that the Tantai was to send forward the draft furnished to him by Mr. Medhurst by yesterday's steamer.

My colleagues appear to fear that the Chinese will attempt, in case of war, to sink ballast-laden hulks upon the bar at Woosung. As our treaty provides for the immunity of our commerce in case of war, that is to say, on the Chinese side, I imagine that the strongest protest could be made against the proposal, which, moreover, is discountenanced, I think, by the feelings of the civilized world.

As my colleagues are disposed to believe that, notwithstanding our treaty, the Chinese in exercise of their right of self-preservation could not be greatly opposed in thus obstructing the bar, I suggest that this question should be considered by you.

I shall send a copy of the draft-letter inclosed to Mr. Bingham.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 802.]

Draught of an identical note to be sent by each consul to his ministerial representative at Peking.

SIR: The probability of a war between China and Japan having of late attracted much attention, and the possibility of such a contingency not having by any means passed over, it has occurred to myself and some of my colleagues to consider what would be the position of the foreign settlements of Shanghai in such an unfortunate event, and how far it would be expedient to adopt such precautions as may render that position a comparatively safe one.

It does not need any extraordinary foresight to predict that Shanghai, from its importance as a commercial center, and from its proximity to one of the few arsenals which China possesses, will become a focus of attack in case of hostilities being declared, and in that event the foreign settlements will at once be exposed to extreme danger, inasmuch as they stand (that portion called British more especially) exactly in a quarter where any outworks necessary to cover the city from hostile approach by the river must be constructed. No move has as yet been made by the Chinese toward the utilization of this strategical position, but they may at any moment see fit to occupy it; and should they do so, and hostilities supervene, the consequences to neutral life and property may be very serious.

The conclusion appears to myself and colleagues obvious, that, if such a sacrifice can be in any way averted, no effort ought to be left untried to accomplish it; and the alternative we would venture to propose is, that advantage should be taken of the presence in Peking of a Japanese minister plenipotentiary to negotiate for the neutralization of the ground covered by the foreign settlements, and a stipulation that nothing shall be done on either side to endanger the safety of the residents therein or of the property in their keeping.

The Taotai of this place, it is believed, will be quite willing to give his consent to this proposition, and I beg to submit it to your excellency, in conjunction with such of my colleagues as are more directly interested, and each of whom has addressed an identical note to his minister, in the hope that the scheme may meet with your favorable consideration.

I may refer here to the twenty-sixth article of the United States treaty with China, which provides for the immunity of American commerce in case of war, and to suggest that such further negotiations may be undertaken with the Japanese as will render this provision operative as far as they are concerned; and in this connection it may be mentioned that the Chinese are likely to obstruct the Woosung Bar in case of war unless some means are adopted to prevent them from taking this course.

Various and serious questions, it must be confessed, will be involved in the adoption of the proposed measure, but as these must of necessity occur to your mind, and their discussion scarcely comes within my province, I prefer to submit the simple proposition free of all argument or remark. My colleagues agree with me that it is also beyond our province to propose that any arrangement arrived at will embrace all the foreign settlements in China and Japan, but it may not be amiss to point out how obviously desirable such an extension would be.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE GENERAL,
Shanghai, September 2, 1874. (Received October 12.)

SIR: Referring to the matter of the arrest of General Le Gendre, at Amoy, I have now to submit the following further information:

After the consideration which I gave to the subject, as indicated in my dispatch No. 797, it seemed to me that a prosecution of Le Gendre before me under the neutrality act must fail.

* * * * *

At this juncture I received a dispatch from Dr. Williams, dated July 31, a copy of which I inclose.

Looking to the tenor of this letter I concluded that my wisest course would be to release Le Gendre immediately upon his arrival here. I did this, and now inclose to you a copy of my dispatch to Dr. Williams, No. 387, reporting this action.

After Le Gendre's arrival I received two letters from the consul-general for Japan, copies of which, and of my responses and of the order to release Le Gendre, will be found herewith.

I have received no word from Dr. Williams of later date than the dispatch of July 31.

The arrest of Le Gendre gave the liveliest satisfaction to all the Chinese officials. Mr. Henderson's dispatch No. 44 to the Department speaks of the sentiments of the Chinese in this regard. They consider that Le Gendre has been the promoter of the whole business, and seem to feel that the chances of an amicable settlement with Japan would be increased by his removal from the field.

* * * * *

It is with extreme satisfaction that I learn at this moment that the leave of Lieutenant Cassel has been revoked. There are difficulties in dealing with our citizens who are civilians, but none can arise when the person is an officer of the Government. And for the one the responsibility of the Government is very different from that which arises in the other case.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD,
Consul-General.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 31, 1874.

SIR: I have received your two dispatches, No. 369 of 17th ultimo, and No. 377 of the 8th instant, with one from Consul Henderson of the last date, all relating to the Japanese invasion of Formosa and the connection of American citizens with that expedition, and the proper action of United States consular authorities growing out of it.

In Mr. Henderson's dispatch a report is given of some of the proceedings of Mr. Cassel and Mr. Wasson in aid of the Japanese, and you are of opinion that writs of arrest against them and other Americans in the expedition may now properly be issued.

I have carefully read all these papers and whatever else I can learn bearing upon the subject; and I shall defer for a while to instruct Mr. Henderson in the premises to issue such writs, for the following reasons:

One initial difficulty in this whole affair is that there has been no declaration of war on either side. Both the Chinese and Japanese governments affirm that they are still at peace, although the latter have committed hostile acts against the former, invading their territory, attacking the villages of aborigines, and appropriating property taken by force. We know that neither of these nations acknowledge or understand what is technically called international law, and therefore between each other we can hardly look for their acting according to its requirements.

* * * * *

The officers of the Tsungli yamun were much startled to learn that the Japanese were assisted and guided by United States naval and military officers; and it is not strange that they complained that this was in direct violation of Article I of the treaty between China and America, and asked me to order them to withdraw from their connection with the force then going to Formosa. I declined to do so at first, on the plea that the Japanese had assured foreign nations that they had the consent of the government of Peking to chastise the aborigines of Formosa for injuries done their subjects; but learning afterwards that this assurance was quite unauthorized, I told the yamun that the consul had been directed to warn them and all Americans to leave the expedition. These officials have been fully told that until there has been a declaration of war, it is difficult for foreign nations to take any decided action in respect to this quarrel; and until something has been done by them, or the opposing forces of the two nations come to actual blows, our countrymen may plead that in aiding the Japanese they are not violating the neutrality act, nor any provision in the treaty of 1858, or the act of June 22, 1860. Whatever ideas the Chinese and Japanese may have about international obligations and rights, and however they may conduct their negotiations in relation to this invasion of Formosa, we must have regard to our own usages. The fact of a state of war must be tested by a formal declaration from one side or the other, or by the commencement of fighting between their opposing forces; and until this has been done, it may be urged that the provisions of the twenty-fourth section of the act of June 22, 1860, do not apply, and that the Americans in the service of the Japanese did not enlist "to make war upon any foreign power with whom the United States are at peace." Their enlistment might lead to complications, but as they are at liberty to enter that service, the point where it becomes a violation of neutrality and treaty rights depends on the action and declaration of the two chief actors.

The arrival of the Japanese minister in Peking this week brings the parties into closer relations upon the management of this affair, and they may soon arrange it peaceably, if rumors are at all to be relied on.

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

HIS IMPERIAL JAPANESE MAJESTY'S CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Shanghai, August 18, 1874.

SIR: You have doubtless been informed that General Charles W. Le Gendre, a citizen of the United States and late United States consul at Amoy, who was engaged by the Japanese government through the United States minister in Japan, in December 1872, in conformity with the terms of Article X of the treaty of 1858 between Japan and the United States, to serve in the department of foreign affairs at Tokei as an officer of the second rank, who lately came to China as His Imperial Japanese Majesty's special commissioner, was on the 6th day of August, 1874, forcibly taken before the United States consular court at Amoy by United States marines landed for that purpose from the United States steamship Yantic, upon unknown charges, and in virtue of a warrant issued by the United States consul at Amoy, while he was in Amoy on his way to Foochow and Shanghai on business connected with his mission; that on the day following the Hon. Charles W. Le Gendre was, against his will, again brought before the United States consular court at Amoy, when for the first time he was verbally made acquainted with the charges made against him; that from that date until the 13th instant he was forcibly detained at Amoy by the United States consul, and was thereby rendered unable to discharge the duties intrusted to him by His Imperial Japanese Majesty; that on both occasions he notified the United States consul that he yielded only to force, which he was unable to resist, in suffering the violence and detention to which he was subjected; that he strongly protested against these proceedings with the United States consul at Amoy; that Mr. Gosheki, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's acting consul at Amoy, found it his duty to himself protest in the most formal and solemn manner against these acts of violence toward His Imperial Japanese Majesty's special commissioner, as being a manifest infraction of the rights of nations, and contrary to the privileges and immunities which commissioners enjoy in civilized countries, although such officers may not always be vested with the character of public ministers; that on the 13th day of August, 1874, the United States consul informed Mr. Gosheki that Mr. Le Gendre was arrested by him in the United States consulate upon a charge of advising, aiding, and abetting an expedition in hostility to the government of China in violation of the laws of the United States and their treaty with China; and that he had informed Mr. Le Gendre that in so doing he was acting under instructions from the United States legation at Peking.

In the afternoon of the 13th instant the Hon. Charles W. Le Gendre was sent to Shanghai in charge of the acting clerk of the United States consular court of Amoy, and upon his arrival at this port, a paper purporting to come from you was read to him by the marshal of the United States consulate-general, from which he was given to understand that he had been released from arrest by order of the minister, and that there would be no occasion to hold him for trial on the charge preferred against him by the consul at Amoy.

The circumstances of the arrest and detention of General Le Gendre being now the subject of correspondence between the governments interested in the affair, I beg that you will have the goodness to furnish me, for the information of His Imperial Japanese Majesty's government, with a copy of the paper read to him by your order on his arrival at Shanghai, as stated above, if possible before the departure of the mail for Japan.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 387, I have now the honor to report that General Le Gendre arrived at Shanghai on the 16th instant, and was at once released from arrest upon an order given by me.

The consul-general for Japan at this port has written to me two letters, asking for a copy of his order of release. I inclose copies of his letters, and of my responses, and as well a copy of my order.

I presume that the anxiety to possess this document is induced because it indicates that my instructions from you do not require a prosecution of General Le Gendre, while Mr. Henderson appears to have stated that his arrest was in pursuance of your instructions. Mr. Henderson may very well have supposed that my first telegram to him was based on late advices from you, especially on the advice expected in response to his report of the service of the warning to leave the Formosa expedition upon Messrs. Cassel and Wasson.

I inclose herewith a copy of a protest made by General Le Gendre before the consular court at Amoy.

I may revert to this matter at a later date.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 4, 1874.

SIR: Your No. 40 of the date of July 11 has been received.

Referring to my No. 20, addressed to you under date of 29th of August last, I need not further discuss the questions therein treated.

While the Department appreciates the earnestness and sincerity of your purpose, and approves of the vigilance manifested by the representatives of the Government in enforcing the laws for the maintenance of the neutrality of this Government and of its citizens, in case of war between other powers with which the United States may be at peace, or in case of insurrection within the jurisdiction of a friendly power, care should be observed that the representatives of the Government do not themselves transcend the limits of the laws, or assume powers not granted to them.

Your notification of the 16th of June, of which a copy accompanies your dispatch, is open to many of the objections stated in my No. 409 to Mr. Seward, accompanying my No. 20 to you, to the notification therein referred to.

It threatens "arrest and trial for violation of the laws of neutrality." Neutrality implies the existence of a state of war.

This Government is not advised of the existence of war between China and Japan. If such condition exists, and a notice or proclamation be called for and justified, it should itself be impartial and warn against unlawful aid to either party belligerent, and not threaten penalties only against those who may transgress on one side.

The Department is not in possession of the authority by which you issue the notification of June 16, "by instruction from Hon. S. Wells Williams, United States chargé d'affaires, Peking."

In the instruction No. 409 the power of the minister in Japan or in China to issue writs in maintenance of the neutral obligations of this Government was referred to, and the exclusiveness of that power in the minister was noticed.

No. 416.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 9, 1874.

SIR : The Department has received your dispatch No. 797, dated August 11, 1874, in reference to the arrest of Colonel Le Gendre, late consul at Amoy, and to which is annexed the telegraphic correspondence between Mr. Henderson, consul at Amoy, and yourself upon the question.

The Department is not advised of the termination of the proceedings, nor whether General Le Gendre has been held for trial, or what course has been finally adopted.

It does not clearly appear to the Department that a state of hostilities exists between China and Japan, nor is the Department precisely informed that General Le Gendre had actually accompanied the expedition to Formosa, nor whether he had committed any act within the jurisdiction of the consul at Amoy, or of any other consulate, for which he could be arrested and brought to trial, nor is the Department advised of the precise offense charged against him, and for which the arrest was made. In the absence of information on these points, and particularly in the absence of information concerning the precise charge made against General Le Gendre, and the proof supporting it, and of the authority to make the arrest, the Department withholds its approval and any expression of opinion. It is therefore desired that a full statement upon all these particular points be furnished, with details of the various steps and present position of the case.

The Department has had occasion to refer to these general questions growing out of the Formosa expedition in a late dispatch.

The Department approves your general efforts and the general efforts of the consuls of the United States in China to promote the establishment of telegraph lines, and the general policy of inducing the authorities to favor and not oppose such work. As to the particular advantage to accrue to the Chinese or to other governments by granting concessions to any particular company or individuals, or as to the form of agreements in such cases, the Department, being without information, withholds any expression of opinion.

The Department has full confidence, however, that, in dealing with this subject, general public considerations will be considered as superior to the advantage of any particular corporation or body.

No. 174.

Mr. Cadwalader to Mr. Seward.

No. 424.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 23, 1874.

SIR: Referring to the case of Walter Jackson, and to your dispatch 800, of August 27, with your correspondence with Mr. Williams and with the colonial secretary at Hong-Kong on the subject, as attached thereto, I have to say that this Department has again considered the questions submitted in the light of all the facts now presented by you.

It appears that Walter Jackson was charged with piracy and assault on board the Satsuma, a British vessel, that he escaped from Hong-Kong, was arrested upon a telegram at Shanghai, and as a citizen of the United States claimed your protection; that you thereupon detained him, and in answer to the demand for his rendition, made by the Hong-Kong authorities, informed them that you would consider a request for his delivery, but stated that you were under no obligation to deliver him except in accordance with the rules for extradition of criminals as settled by treaty between the two governments. The Hong-Kong government, learning that Jackson was a citizen of the United States, forthwith declined to proceed further against him, and afterward submitted to you a copy of an opinion of the attorney-general concerning your action in the matter.

The simple question, therefore, is, had you a right to detain a fugitive from British justice at Hong-Kong, found within your consular jurisdiction, or to deliver him up under the extradition treaty between this country and Great Britain? Other questions doubtless arose in your correspondence with Mr. Williams, but that is the important and vital point. In the opinion of the Department, no doubt can exist on this question. The extradition treaty between Great Britain and the United States entitles the British authorities to demand the rendition of persons charged with the commission of the particular crimes mentioned in the treaty, within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, who shall seek an asylum or be found within the territorial limits of the United States, upon a compliance with the provisions of the treaty and of the law to enforce such provisions.

In the case of Walter Jackson all the elements were wanting except the offense charged against him, and extradition proceedings were entirely inapplicable to the case.

Upon the facts shown by you he had escaped from Hong-Kong into the jurisdiction of a foreign country, from which, in the absence of any treaty of extradition, there was no power to return him.

In this view, therefore, all discussion with the colonial authorities at Hong-Kong looking to the rendition of fugitives from British justice who have taken refuge within your consular jurisdiction is inadmissible. The authorities of Hong-Kong seem to concur entirely in this opinion, as shown in their action, declining to make any demand for Jackson, although invited to do so.

Hong-Kong being British territory, the Department does not wish to be understood as holding the converse of the proposition, or as assuming that, in a proper case, the authorities of the United States could not demand the extradition of a fugitive from the justice of the United States who had there sought and found an asylum.

Apart from all questions of extradition, if Jackson was, as represented, a citizen of the United States, and had been arrested and claimed your protection, it was doubtless your duty to interfere in his behalf and to investigate his case. If he had been illegally arrested, it was proper that through your efforts he should be set at liberty. Such action would be proper in any case.

The objection to your proceedings in this case is not that you interfered in his behalf, but that you proposed to deliver him to the Hong-Kong authorities under the extradition treaty, or by means of such proceedings, to be tried for an offense committed against Great Britain.

Such part of your correspondence with Mr. Williams as refers to jurisdiction over persons on board ships in the waters of China is not referred to, as having no necessary bearing in the questions here discussed.

I am, &c.,

J. L. CADWALADER.

No. 175.

Mr. Cadwalader to Mr. Seward.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, Nov. 2, 1874.

No. 425.]

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 811, with its inclosures in reference to the arrest of General Le Gendre, late consul at Amoy, informing the Department of the proceedings taken, and of his final discharge from custody, has been received, and read, in connection with your 797 and Mr. Henderson's Nos. 42 and 44, with careful attention.

As the Department has had occasion in late dispatches, addressed to yourself and to the ministers of the United States in China and Japan, to refer to the questions arising out of the participation of citizens of the United States in the late expedition against the natives of Formosa, reference is had thereto for the general views therein expressed, confining the present dispatch to the particular case now presented.

The dispatches which have been received leave the Department without information upon several points; but from the facts now in its possession, the position of the case appears to be as follows: About December, 1872, General Le Gendre entered the Japanese service, but the precise nature of his employment does not clearly appear. He was reported to have entered in some capacity connected with the foreign office, although it is stated by you that he has acted as a "military adviser." Having taken part in the organization of the expedition about to proceed to Formosa, he was detached through the efforts of Mr. Bingham, and the expedition departed without him. That he has taken any further part in it, directly or indirectly, does not appear, and he is reported as arriving in China, having gone from Yokohama to Hong-Kong, thence to Swatow and Amoy. On his arrival at the latter place instructions were asked by Mr. Henderson, who stated that he was presumed to be on his way to Formosa.

In answer to his request instructions were given by you to Mr. Henderson to arrest him, and he was arrested at Amoy upon the 6th of August. He thereupon filed a protest in the consular court, alleging, among other things, that the warrant on which he was held contained no mention of any offense, and insisting that his entry into the Japanese service was lawful and permitted by the treaty, and that his continuance therein was not in violation of any law of the United States. At his request he was forwarded to Shanghai, and on his arrival, pursuant to the suggestion of Mr. Williams, and by your direction, was discharged from custody. These appear to be the facts as they have been communicated to the Department concerning the arrest.

Many considerations have been advanced by you, tending to show the animus of General Le Gendre toward the Chinese, and the object of his original employment and his visit to China, but all such are, at the most, argument or conjecture.

General Le Gendre was a citizen of the United States who had rendered patriotic and valuable services to his Government, who had lately held the very consulate in which he was arrested, and was represented to be attached to an important mission from the Mikado to the Emperor of China.

On all these grounds a criminal proceeding should not have been commenced against him without grave cause, and only for an offense to substantiate which ample evidence existed. In judging of the legality of this arrest, and of the propriety of his discharge from custody, it is necessary to know precisely the charges and the evidence at hand to support them. Upon these vital points the dispatches in possession of the Department give almost no information.

Exhibit No. 8, attached to your No. 811, being a form of warrant not filled out, and unsigned, is probably intended as a copy of the general form of the warrant on which the arrest was made.

It contains no charge of the commission of any particular offense, no statement of any facts based on which the warrant had been issued, and no mention of any complaint or information having been made. It is true that Mr. Henderson, in his letter of the 10th of August to the acting Japanese consul, states that "General Le Gendre was arrested by me in the United States consulate, upon a charge of advising, aiding, and abetting an expedition in hostility to the government of China, in violation of the laws of the United States and their treaty with China," and in his No. 10, to Mr. Williams, a copy of which was forwarded with his No. 42, to the Department, he states that he has arrested him for aiding the Japanese armed forces in the invasion of the island of Formosa, and these are the only approaches to any distinct statement of a charge.

The offense in each case here referred to is indefinite; no designation is made of the time or place when or where it is alleged to have been committed, and no allegation of the citizenship of the offender, or statement of the particular facts or legal provisions making the act an offense.

By the provisions of the act of 1860, as appears by sections 2 and 7, power is given to the consuls of the United States in China to arraign and try citizens of the United States charged with offenses against law which shall be committed in China, and such provisions are substantially the same in the Revision. (See §§ 4084, 4087.)

It is recognized in general as a part of the jurisprudence of this country, that offenses shall be tried where committed.

In conformity also with the established course of judicial proceedings in the United States, and, as is believed, with the regulations governing similar cases in China, to authorize the issue of a warrant it is necessary that the person against whom the warrant is issued should be charged with an act, or series of acts, making an offense known to the law. The accused also has a right to know, and should be informed of, this particular offense charged against him.

So far as the Department can therefore learn, none of these requisites were complied with in this case.

The consular officers of the United States appear to have acted, as perhaps is necessary, as both prosecutors and judges, but it does not appear that any clearly-defined offense known to the law has been charged against General Le Gendre, or communicated to him or to the Department.

But, apart from the question that no particular offense seems to have been charged, it does not appear that any offense was charged as having been committed within the consular jurisdictions of Shanghai or Amoy, or of the empire of China, but precisely the opposite appears.

The expedition in question was organized in Japan, sailed from Japan without General Le Gendre, and no further connection with it is shown on his part.

The offense in advising, aiding, or abetting the expedition or the invasion, therefore, if offense there was, was committed in a foreign country, outside of the jurisdiction of the consular courts of China.

Further reference to the merits of the case seems not to be required, and the Department refrains from discussing the question whether, in view of all the facts presented to the Department, General Le Gendre had committed any offense either in China or Japan, or whether he had violated the provisions of the act of 1860, or the neutrality act of the United States.

It may, however, safely be said that, in the light of the information forwarded to the Department, serious doubt exists on these questions.

It seems proper further to say, that to have sent General Le Gendre to Japan for trial, as appears to have been proposed, because it was doubted whether a case could be made against him in China, would have been an act beyond the power of a consul of the United States.

A prisoner illegally arrested, or where no offense can be brought home to him, is entitled to his discharge.

He can be sent to another country to be tried only in compliance with treaty provisions for extradition. No such delivery could be made to any authority in Japan.

For all these reasons, and upon the facts as reported, the Department is forced to the conclusion that the arrest of General Le Gendre was without warrant of law, and cannot receive its approval. Had the arrest been the act of a foreign power, it is apprehended that it would have been the ground for energetic action on the part of the United States.

Referring to such parts of your dispatch as relate to the action of the Japanese, the nature of the expedition, and the connection of General Le Gendre with it, and which contain arguments to show his desire and intention to aid the Japanese in hostility to China, it is not perceived that they present evidence of any criminal act on which to sustain an arrest and committal.

SIR: On the 28th of August ultimo, I transmitted to the secretary of foreign affairs the President's proclamation announcing the time and place of holding the centennial anniversary of American Independence and the international exhibition, as provided by late act of Congress. I also asked to be informed, at as early a period as might be convenient, whether it was the purpose of Colombia to create a commission to represent that government at the exhibition, tendering my services to any committee of citizens that might be appointed for that purpose, &c.

On the 13th of September following, the secretary of foreign affairs addressed me a note, saying that the President was very anxious that Colombia should be represented at the exhibition; that measures would be taken to bring the matter before the people, and that the subject would be laid before the Colombian congress, at its next session, with the recommendation that an act be passed creating a special commission, and that an appropriation be made for its proper execution. He also caused the proclamation of the President to be published in the official and other papers here, and in those of the other States of the confederation, thus bringing the matter prominently before the people of this country.

SIR: The State of Panama being so remote and inaccessible from this capital, and the mails so infrequent and irregular, that, up to this time, I have been wholly unable to advise the Department of the condition of affairs there, for the reason that it was impossible to obtain reliable information here.

My latest reliable intelligence from that locality is up to the 27th ultimo. At that time, the political troubles seemed to be over, at least for a season. General Correo, the insurgent chief, had retreated to the interior, most of his followers having forsaken him, and the supposition was that he was then making his way to Costa Rica. The government of General Niere seemed firmly established, and the State legislature, then in session, had conferred upon him dictatorial powers. His acts have been arbitrary in the extreme; nor does he now hesitate to employ to their fullest extent the extraordinary powers thus conferred upon him. His government, in short, is a despotism under the flattering cognomen of a republic, and yet without any of those guarantees to life and property which a strong government is presumed to establish. Arbitrary arrests are of daily occurrence, and while the criminal code of this country humanely spares the life of convicted murderers, petty officials scruple not to order any citizen to be shot who may hesitate to obey their behests. Forced loans are imposed and collected at the point of the bayonet. The amount thus decreed to be paid by property-owners of Panama is $60,000, and this sum is now being rapidly collected. As yet, however, no foreign resident has been taxed.

During the late insurrection much property was destroyed. Dwellings and stores were sacked in the most savage manner. Among the sufferers are said to be some American citizens, who have made application to Consul Long for redress and compensation, but their names and locality are unknown to me. The presence of the United States marines in Panama had a most happy effect, and but for the prompt action of Admiral Almy, the desolation would doubtless have been more general.

There has been, and is still, a general feeling of insecurity among foreign residents and property-owners, especially among those interested in the Panama Railroad. The federal government seems wholly powerless to afford protection to foreign interests there, and even here, in Bogota, there seems developing a public sentiment that the isthmus is merely a source of weakness and expense.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Bogota, November 27, 1873. (Received December 30.)

SIR: Dr. Santiago Perez, late minister from this country to the United States, having received the majority of votes in six of the nine States of the confederation, has been declared, by the several State legislatures, the constitutionally elected President of Colombia for the term beginning the 1st of April, 1874, and ending April 1, 1876.

All previous apprehensions of a revolution seem dissipated, and the probabilities are that Mr. Perez's inauguration will be peaceable. In that event, it is not improbable that Dr. Murillo, the present incumbent, will be named minister either to the United States or England.

In the States of Bolivar and Magdalena the insurrectionary troubles seem to be over, at least for the present, all the leading insurgents having either compromised with, or surrendered to, the legitimate authorities. The newly-elected governor of the last-named state was inaugurated on the 1st ultimo, October, and a bill is now pending in the legislature making all persons who may hereafter engage in revolution pecuniarily responsible for all expenses caused the government by their acts, and likewise amenable to such individuals as may suffer therefrom. Efforts are also being made to repeal the import duty on flour, which, including state and national tax, is now $8 per barrel.

Nearly all the flour heretofore imported has been from the United States.

In the states of Antioque and Cauca there is a steadily-increasing trade with the United States. The articles mostly imported are lamps, petroleum, sewing-machines, hardware, cotton cloth, carpets, agricultural implements, carpenters' and miners' tools, machinery, &c. From Medellin to the Rio Magdalena, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, a first-class carriage-road is in progress of construction, twenty-five miles of which is already completed.

As Antioque is a mining state, and does not produce provisions sufficient for local consumption, it will probably become, when this new road shall have been completed, a considerable market for the surplus products of the United States. The same is true of Tolima. In both the states named there are several American companies engaged in extensive and successful mining operations, which have opened a nucleus for increased American trade.

The projected railway from Buenaventura, on the Pacific coast, to Cali, in the Cauca Valley, is, as you are doubtless aware, the enterprise of an American company, formed at Peoria, Ill. Work was commenced on the 16th June last, but, owing to some misunderstanding relative to the transfer to the company, in virtue of a contract with the Colombian government, of the property of the "Buenaventura Mule-Road Company," and to the efforts on the part of the railroad company to procure some modification in the original contract, it has not been resumed. These disputes having been settled, and the modifications in the contract obtained, the company now announce their purpose to resume work very soon, and hopes are entertained by the government and capitalists here that the road will be built.

As there has been no official statement of the national debt of Colombia for the current year, and probably will not be for some weeks yet, I shall have to defer any attempt to inform the Department in relation thereto until some official or authentic data can be obtained. Under the Murillo administration the bonded debt of the confederation has been very materially reduced.

SIR: In the afternoon of the 15th instant the house into which I had that day been moving was stoned by the rabble attached to a religious procession. Neither the flag-staff or shield of the legation, nor the legation itself, was at the time attached to or in the house. They were still at the house of the legation, in another part of the city, from which I had been moving.

The house against which the indignity was offered was unoccupied at the time, except by a few articles of furniture previously sent over, and by myself and little son, who chanced to be there; he on the balcony overlooking the street, I inside superintending some workmen who were arranging the office-furniture. All the other houses fronting the plaza, except this one, had hung from their windows and balconies symbolic emblems in recognition of the procession. I am quite certain, from all that I can learn, that the perpetrators did not know the character of the house or its new occupants. You will perceive, from the annexed correspondence, that the government acted with commendable promptness, and without solicitation. Some of the perpetrators have been apprehended, and are now in confinement, and the incident will possibly lead to the suppression of all such processions in the future.

Hoping that my course in this matter, as indicated in my reply to Mr. Colunjé's note, may meet the approval of the Department,

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Bogota, December 16, 1873.

The undersigned, secretary of the interior and of foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, feels himself constrained to address the honorable William L. Scruggs, minister resident of the United States of America, for the purpose of expressing to him the profound pain that the government has experienced at what happened, as they are informed, in the disagreeable incidents of the evening of yesterday, regarding a religious procession that was being celebrated at the time his excellency was proceeding toward his new house of habitation.

The executive administration quite as much lament as they are surprised at the occurrence, where the practice among our people permits perfect religious liberty, guaranteed by the national constitution; and they are utterly at a loss to account for the object of the attack made upon the dwelling of the representative of a nation for which the people of Colombia have so much respect and friendship, and when the person of that representative is so highly respected here for the high qualities which distinguish him.

The government of the undersigned feels perfectly satisfied, from the information in their possession, that the rabble who executed the outrage did not know against whom they directed it; a circumstance that can be very well explained by the confusion which is wont to be produced by processions and acts such as referred to.

The undersigned hastens to assure your excellency that he has taken means which will promptly punish the authors of the act—an act which would have no explanation of its origin but for the ignorance and fanaticism arising from a former régime and state of society which should be responsible therefor.

The government of the undersigned flatters itself with the belief that the honorable Mr. Scruggs will not judge of the country in general by the incident which is the motive of this note, and doubts not that he will duly esteem the spontaneity of the sentiments that are expressed herein. The undersigned indulges the hope that your excellency will accept the expression of great personal respect and consideration with which he has the honor to be

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, December 18, 1873.

The undersigned, resident minister of the United States of America, takes peculiar pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of the very polite and considerate note of the 16th instant, which the honorable Jil Colunjé, Secretary of the interior and of foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, was pleased to address to him in deprecation of the disagreeable incident growing out of a religious procession in this city on the day previous.

The uniform courtesy and kindness with which the undersigned has been received and treated by the government and people of Colombia, since his arrival in this capital, leaves him no room to doubt the sincerity of the renewed assurances contained in your excellency's note, nor to question the friendly emotions and sentiments of respect professed by the people of Colombia for those of the United States.

The unpleasant incident referred to belongs to a class liable to occur in almost any country, however liberal its constitution of government, or however well and faithfully its laws may be executed. Moreover, the undersigned is of the opinion expressed by your excellency, that the ignorant and fanatical rabble, the remains of a former civilization, knew not the character of the house or the persons of its new occupants, to whom the indignity was offered; while the prompt and spontaneous assurances by the government of your excellency that measures have been taken looking to the speedy punishment of the wrong-doers is accepted by the undersigned as quite all that he could reasonably ask or expect.

The undersigned therefore begs leave to express his high appreciation of this prompt disclaimer and unsolicited action on the part of the government, and to assure your excellency of his disinclination to judge of the people and institutions of Colombia by this exceptional and isolated incident; and with the reiteration of his sentiments of great personal esteem, he has the honor to remain,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: Before receiving your No. 15, of the 29th October last, I had already received from the officers of the Panama Railway Company a full statement of the late troubles on the Isthmus, and of the consequent interruption of its railway transit. It was accompanied by a representation and a formal protest, addressed to the President of Colombia, which I had, on their behalf, placed before the government here.

I had likewise suggested, orally and informally, to the Colombian minister for foreign affairs, that the government increase its national guard on the Isthmus sufficiently to deter attacks upon the road, and to keep the interoceanic transit free from interruption by local factions. After receiving your No. 15, I immediately addressed Mr. Colunje the formal note a copy of which, together with his reply thereto, is herewith submitted. It will be observed that, by the terms of the new executive order, the national guard in Panama is never to be less than two hundred strong, and that its specialty will be to afford protection to the Isthmus Railway against the violence of local factions.

The placing of this force under the direction of the state authorities of Panama is, in my judgment, a defect in the efficacy of the means proposed; but, under a constitutional provision of this country, it is difficult to see how it might have been avoided.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, December 19, 1873.

The undersigned minister resident of the United States of America, in compliance with a request by the officers of the Panama Railway Company, has already had th honor to transmit to the government of his excellency the Hon. Jil Colunjé, secretary of the interior and of foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, a representation and protest by said company relating to the recent disturbances on the Isthmus, and to ask that the railway transit of the Isthmus be in future better protected by the government of Colombia from the violence of local factions.

The government of the undersigned deems it important in the interest of general commerce, and especially of the carrying-trade of that route, that these disturbances should, in the future, be more effectually guarded against.

By the treaty with New Granada of 1846, the obligations of which were assumed by its successor, the United States of Colombia, the Government of the undersigned engaged to guarantee the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama. But this engagement has never been acknowledged to embrace the duty of protecting the road across the Isthmus from the violence of local factions. It is therefore regarded as the undoubted duty of the government of Colombia to protect that road against attacks from local insurgents.

The undersigned is accordingly instructed by his Government to bring this matter to the attention of your excellency, and to ask that a sufficient force be kept on the Isthmus to deter attacks upon the road, its officers and employés.

With renewed assurances the undersigned has the honor to remain, &c.,

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, December 26, 1873.

The undersigned, secretary of the interior and foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, at the same time that he acknowledges the receipt of the protest made by the representatives of the Panama Railway Company, directed to him with the note of the 6th of the present month by the Hon. William L. Scruggs, minister resident of the United States of America, has the honor to answer the other note of the 19th of the same month, in which his excellency manifests that his Government deems it important in the interest of general commerce, and especially of the transit of that route, that in the future disturbances, such as recently have occurred there, be avoided by the government of this union stationing a sufficient force there to protect the transit against the violence of local factions, and to prevent attacks upon the road itself, its officers and employés.

As the honorable minister in his note observes, the stipulations of the treaty of 1846, by which his Government compromised itself to guarantee the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, did not include the obligation to protect the railroad against the class of violences referred to, the undersigned makes known from the present that the Colombian government has considered, and will always consider as its exclusive function and duty, to give that protection, a protection which this government has never refused, although it may have appeared inadequate during the late disturbances, on account of the magnitude of the acts committed at so great a distance from this capital. Furthermore, the undersigned communicates to his excellency the minister, that on the 15th of the present month, a decree was made, to the end that hereafter no disturbances may be permitted on the line of the railway; a decree for the prompt enforcement of which there will always be a sufficient national force in Panama at the disposal of the state government.

By this provision, which Mr. Scruggs will read in the annexed note, the President of this union hopes that the public tranquillity on that interoceanic road will be made secure; with which will be satisfied the most ardent desires of the government of the undersigned, the wishes of that which his excellency so worthily represents, those of the railroad company, and those of universal commerce.

The undersigned feels a particular pleasure in reiterating to the honorable Mr. Scruggs the assurance of his high consideration, &c.

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, NATIONAL EXECUTIVE POWER,
OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS, SECTION 2, No. 173,
Bogota, December 15, 1873.

To the Honorable Secretary of War and Marine:

The frequent armed revolution in the State of Panama, and the grave circumstance that the principal center of these revolutions is almost always the capital of that state, the western terminus of the interoceanic railway, constructed in that part of the republic to which the government of the union owes especial security, have persuaded this government that it is altogether impossible for it to fulfill that duty there, if there be not prevented in the most efficacious manner, as well in the city of Panama as all along the line of the railway, any interruption whatever of public order, be its magnitude whatever it may; as there every movement of this kind produces suspension or checking of traffic, danger more or less real to the persons and interests of passengers, and universal discredit for the enterprise, for the state, and for the nation.

To the end, therefore, that such deplorable acts may not be repeated, and that if repeated they may be immediately repressed, the citizen President of the union decrees that the national forces in Panama be always of the number of two hundred men at least, and that the commander of it there be instructed, as the most important of his orders, this: That he and the force under his command must be always ready to prevent or repress, under the direction of the local authorities, any disturbance whatever of public order on the above-mentioned line of railway. The President desires that these orders be fulfilled in the very shortest time possible.

The Montejo question, of which I treated at due length in article 84 of my former memorial, and which I there said that, being the only one that had remained pending between the United States of America and those of Colombia, appeared terminated also, judging by the continued silence with respect to it preserved by the North American Government, is still continued. That Government had not abandoned it, as I was led to believe, but had reserved to itself the right to resume the prosecution of the discussion through the medium of a new minister, whom it proposed to send to fill the vacancy left by Mr. Hurlbut. The new minister came, or did come, and, on the 24th day of July, 1873, presented his credentials to the President of the Union, in public audience. He is the honorable William L. Scruggs, a person, in all respects, of the highest esteem. His courteous character has made easy and not vexatious (offensive) a discussion so delicate and unpleasant (ungrateful) as that which has its origin in the impressment (capture) and occupation (detention) of said ship by revolutionists; and, although no conclusion satisfactory to both parties had been arrived at, he at once entertained the proposition which I had just made him—seeing that we were unable to adjust differences after a long conference—to submit the point to the decision of arbitrators. But, as he wanted instructions, in order to a formal acceptance of the proposition, he had asked for and was awaiting them. He is now absent, and upon his return or before, (his return,) he will be in readiness to give his definite answer.

Extract from report of Colombian minister of foreign affairs to Congress, February, 1874.

[Translation.]

With the view of commemorating, on its centennial, the Declaration of Independence of the United States of North America, there is now being prepared by that Government the celebration of one of those universal assemblies of science and industry that form one of the marks by which our epoch is honorably distinguished.

In effect, the President of that nation has declared and made known, by means of a proclamation issued the 3d of July last, that in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, there will be held an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and agricultural and mineral products, which will be opened on the 1st of April, 1876, and closed the 1st of October of the same year; and, in the same document, in the interests of peace and of friendship and domestic and international relations, he incites the people of the United States to celebrate the exhibition, and invites all nations, in the name of the North American Government and people, to take part in such festival.

The (señor) minister resident of that Government addressed himself to me, by a note of the 28th of August last past, with the object of transmitting to ours a copy of the said proclamation, and also of manifesting to it his hope that, the matter being taken into consideration here, it might be considered convenient to call the attention of the Colombian people as well to the exposition as to its object, commencing thus to excite their co-operation therein, and with the purpose of manifesting also that the President of the North American Union hoped that, with the opportunity which the exhibition will offer for the cultivation of sentiments and intercourse between the two countries would redound in new and even greater benefits to science and industry, and would serve equally to strengthen the bonds of peace and friendship which now happily exist between the government and people of Colombia and the Government and people of the United States; and the (señor) minister added that he would be pleased to be informed, as soon as might be convenient, whether the government of Colombia proposed to create a commission to represent this republic in the exposition and have the care of Colombian interests that might occupy a place there. I answered the honorable Mr. Scruggs that the executive power would inform the national Congress of the magnificent project of the exposition, as well as of the polite invitation of the President of the United States, in order that that body might dictate the necessary provisions for Colombia's participation in that festival of liberty and of the intelligent labor of the entire world—a participation which should correspond to the influence which the transcendental act to be commemorated has exercised over our country itself; which should symbolize the veneration which we profess for the men who signed and heroically sustained the Declaration of Independence, and that might be a pledge worthy of the unalterable friendship which has existed, and always should exist, between the nations.

A translation of the proclamation, and also of the (señor) minister's note, are found together with my answer, among the documents of this memorial, (report,) under the letter L.

SIR: The Hon. I inclose herewith a translation of the note of the acting secretary of foreign affairs, advising me of this designation.

Notwithstanding the terms of the secretary's note, it is understood here that Mr. Zapata is commissioned to England especially, and that his residence will be in London. He, however, visits the United States on his way, and will, as he informs me, spend some weeks in Washington. Of the nature of his visit or the precise character of his commission thither, I know nothing definitely.

Although it is alleged here that, for economical reasons, the three missions to England, France, and the United States have been thus united by the executive, and that no minister will be appointed specially to Washington, it is understood in official circles here that an appointment of a minister to the United States will be made some time after the adjournment of the present congress. The reasons for deferring the appointment appear to be of a local partisan nature.

ART. 134. In order that the goods and effects of diplomatic agents may enjoy the rights of free importation, the following proceedings are necessary:

1. If the effects and goods should accompany the diplomatic agent, he shall present with his passport, to the chief of the custom-house, a written and signed list, in which shall appear the number of packages, and their marks and numbers.

2. If the effects and goods should not come with the diplomatic agent, they shall be subject to all the formalities provided for the introduction of cargoes of private individuals; but they shall be delivered free of duty upon the presentation to the chief of the custom-house of an order from the secretary of hacienda, (a branch of the treasury department,) in which are specified the marks, and the number of packages to be delivered. The delivery may also be made before the order is received, if the importer agrees to give security or bond, which the executive power may determine in the regulations which he may issue for the special execution of the present code. If the order should be received before the receipt at the custom-house of the packages, the security for the payment of import duties thereon may be dispensed with.

3. UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Bogota, July 27, 1874. (Received September 9.)

SIR: The sixty-fourth anniversary of the declaration of the independence of Colombia, occurring on the 20th instant, was celebrated here in a manner peculiar to this people.

At 10 a. m., on the 19th, there was a grand parade through the streets by the children and officers of the public and private schools. At 12 m., on the same day, there was music and singing in the plaza Bolivar. At 5 p. m. there was an imposing procession, headed by the ecclesiastics bearing a cross, an image of the crucifixion, and of the Virgin Mary, followed by the president and his cabinet, from the cathedral Vera Cruz to the plaza Bolivar. These images are represented to be the identical ones that were held up by the clergy of the viceroy to the martyrs of the revolution at the time of their public execution, during the struggle for independence of the Spanish Crown.

On the night of the 19th, all the houses and public buildings, excepting, however, the churches, were brilliantly illuminated, including, of course, the houses of the foreign legations.

The morning of the 20th was hailed by salutes of cannon, and banners were hung from the windows and balconies of all the private residences along the principal thoroughfares. At 9 a. m. public mass was said, and an appropriate sermon was preached, in the large cathedral fronting the plaza Bolivar.

At 12 m. the diplomatic body, by previous invitation through the secretary for foreign affairs, repaired to the executive mansion, and were formally received by the President. The customary congratulatory addresses were read by the dean of the diplomatic corps, and by the President.

At 1 p. m. the President and cabinet, accompanied by the diplomatic corps, proceeded between an honorary guard of soldiers to the plaza Bolivar.

Our arrival thither was hailed by music, salutes of cannon, shouts, sky-rockets, and the waving of banners. Proceeding to the bronze statue of Bolivar, in the center of the plaza, the original draft of the declaration of independence was there read and speeches made by the President of the republic and by the director-general of the national university. The President then placed the golden crown, brilliantly set with pearls and diamonds—a present from Peru to Colombia in 1864—upon the head of the statue.

The children of the public schools of the city, embracing both sexes, all ages, colors, and conditions, marched into the plaza, each of the males wearing a jacobin cap of liberty, and formed a hollow square around the statue, where they went through various evolutions, singing a beautiful native chorus. The President and cabinet, accompanied by the diplomatic body, then retired, thus ending the official ceremonies of the occasion.

Under the supervision of the municipality and of individual speculators, the feasts were protracted during the five remaining days of the week, but the exhibition bore no official character whatever. The time was consumed in horse-racing, cock and bull fighting, and in gambling, the last-named sport being openly permitted by the laws of this country, and is still a national vice of Colombia.

According to my understanding of general instructions from the Department, I have deemed it not improper to communicate the above, fearing, however, that it may be wholly unworthy of your attention.

In conclusion, I must crave your further indulgence for referring to a subject still more trivial in itself, but to which the perversity and ignorance of some of our own countrymen resident here, as in the United States, have given undue importance. I allude, of course, to the dress of diplomatic representatives on occasions of official ceremony. I presume that there has been no time, since the date of Mr. Marcy's circular of June, 1853, when newspaper gossip at home has not been freely reprinted in foreign countries, exciting invidious comment. The act of Congress of March 27, 1867, making notable exceptions in favor of persons who may have, at some time or other, held military commissions, seems to have had a tendency to increase rather than to diminish this meddlesome comment. Government officials here, under institutions so republican in theory, as well as sensible persons everywhere, generally commend the rule prescribed, of adopting the plain dress of the citizen for our diplomatic representatives abroad, as being more dignified and more in keeping with our institutions and practices at home. But the matter has been frequently referred to in my presence, by resident American citizens, as well as by foreigners and attachés of other legations, in a disparaging spirit.

This subject has been partially set at rest by legislation; and I venture to suggest that if all exceptions were abolished it would avoid invidious remark, and add uniformity in dress, on official occasions, of our representatives abroad, and make it more in keeping with its civil character, while it could in no possible manner detract from the influence and consideration of our ministers.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Bogota, August 7, 1874. (Received September 15.)

SIR: Since the date of my No. 10, of the 7th of September last, the controversy between the republic of Venezuela and that of Colombia has remained in statu quo, with the exception of some additional aggravations growing out of alleged infractions of existing treaties by revolutionary parties in the former government occupying the disputed territory as a basis of predatory operations.

It seems there has existed for some time past a revolutionary faction in Venezuela seeking the overthrow of that government, or rather the administration of it. These insurgents occupy some portions of the disputed territory along the line of the river Arauca, making that a basis of operations, and levying duties in excess of those prescribed by treaty stipulations between the two countries upon all produce and merchandise exported from Colombia through the territory of Venezuela.

This called forth a remonstrance from the Colombian government. That of Venezuela replies, June 19, 1874, in a sharp and threatening manner, charging Colombia with bad faith, and demanding reparation for injuries resulting from alleged violations of neutrality laws by Colombian citizens in the northern portion of the State of Santander.

The response of Colombia, July 16, 1874, is conciliatory but firm in tone; endeavoring to prove that while she has never yielded her claim to the territory in dispute, she has taken all possible care to enforce the neutrality laws as well upon the inhabitants of the territory in dispute as upon those occupying portions of the State of Santander, to which her title has never been questioned.

Thus the matter rests at present. President Perez, in the hope of bringing the controversy to an amicable adjustment, has commissioned his immediate predecessor, Dr. Manuel Murillo, as special envoy to Venezuela, with full powers to negotiate a settlement. Doctor Murillo has formally accepted the charge, and will leave Bogota for Caracas on the 17th instant.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 29, 1873.

SIR: Inclosed is a copy of a letter of the 25th instant, and of the papers by which it is accompanied, addressed to this Department by Mr. John Keeler, Secretary of the Panama Railroad Company, relating to recent disturbances on the Isthmus of Panama. This Department deems it important, in the interest of general commerce, and especially of the carrying trade of that route, that these disturbances should be guarded against. By the treaty with New Granada of 1846 this Government has engaged to guarantee the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama. This engagement, however, has never been acknowledged to embrace the duty of protecting the road across it from the violence of local factions; but it is regarded as the undoubted duty of the Colombian government to protect it against attacks from local insurgents.

You are consequently requested to address a representation upon this subject to the Colombian minister for foreign affairs, and to ask that a sufficient force be kept on the isthmus to deter attacks upon the road, its officers, or servants.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

OFFICE PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY,
New York, October 25, 1873.

SIR: I beg leave to place before you copies of a part of the correspondence of the officers of this company now on the isthmus, advising the commencement and continuation of hostilities between the state government now existing and the revolutionists at Panama and the insufficient protection of the transit afforded by the national government. This is the second revolution that has occurred this year; and although hostilities had ceased at the last advices for the time, it does not bring with it the assurance of continuation, as it is thought that the cessation was only caused by the want of ammunition, and would be renewed as soon as this want was supplied.

You will please notice in the correspondence that our trains have been stopped, the lives of our officers threatened, and the business of the road very seriously interrupted; and not only has the property of this company and the lives of its employés been endangered, but the lives of the passengers and the commerce of the world passing over this inter-oceanic railroad have been seriously imperiled.

Since the opening of the railroad, in the year 1855, the state of Panama has been subject to frequent revolutions, all of which have been attended with more or less bloodshed, and with disturbances which have not only seriously affected the commercial character of the route, but have often endangered the lives of passengers and property in transit.

The security of the isthmus-transit is a subject of great importance to all commercial nations; and this company desires respectfully but earnestly to bring this subject to the attention of the State Department of the United States, being encouraged to do so by the terms of the treaties of 1846 and 1857, under which the neutrality of the isthmus is guaranteed; and the government of the United States of Colombia agrees (as we are advised) to maintain a sufficient force of national troops on the isthmus, with the view that the transit from one sea to the other may not be interrupted or embarrassed. Please note in the correspondence inclosed that the national troops maintained on the isthmus for the protection of the transit joined the state forces soon after the commencement of hostilities.

This company gratefully acknowledges the many instances in which protection has been afforded by the Government of the United States; in each successive case we have hoped that the disturbing causes would disappear in the progress of the times. In this we have been disappointed; the local disturbances have increased in violence and frequency. And we do most respectfully urge the importance of such a protection to the transit as to place it beyond the possibility of further interruption or embarrassment by these oft-repeated political disturbances.

I remain, your obedient servant,

JOHN KEELER,
Secretary

RISEING STAR, Aspinwall, October 4, 1873.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inform you that during the night of September 23 hostilities commenced between the state government of General Neira and the "Outsiders," as they are called, the latter attacking.

On the morning of September 24 I received a telegram from Captain Dow, as follows:

"One hundred men from United States steamer Pensacola were landed at 6 last evening and quartered at the station. The ball of revolution is fairly opened; communication with town interrupted; fighting now going on between the state and city."

This announcement was not unexpected. Fortunately for us, we were better prepared than at any recent period, the Pensacola and Benicia, United States Navy, being at Panama, while the Wyoming arrived here during the same night.

On the morning of the 24th instant Commander Cushing, of the United States steamer Wyoming, called; and it was during our first interview that the following telegram came from J. W. Fry, track-master, Rio Grande station, September 24, 12 m.:

"On my way home from Panama this morning I found a red flag displayed near the water-tank, and ascertained on stopping that it was placed to stop the train from Aspinwall. I ordered the flag removed and started again, when two men advanced, pointed a revolver and musket at me, and threatened me with death in case I proceeded. I was permitted to go, on condition I would order the train to stop."

I then, after consulting with Commander Cushing, addressed a note to the prefect of this place, of which the following is a copy:

"SIR: Information has been received that the morning train of this date from here has been stopped by armed men and the life of an employé of this company has been threatened. Under these circumstances, I have to ask you to send an armed force with each train leaving this terminus for its protection, the first to leave at 1 p. m. to-day.

"Your immediate reply will oblige your obedient servant,

TRACY ROBINSON,
"Acting Superintendent."

I give you a translation of the reply to this, as follows :

"In this department the government has not the power to protect the interests of the Panama Railroad Company, having only a few policemen to attend to the town duties. This I shall communicate to the government of the state, that it will, no doubt, take it in consideration.

"IGNACIO PEREZ."

This admission obtained, (an important one,) I at first thought of sending a force from the Wyoming, which Commander Cushing was ready to furnish ; but, as this end of the road was still quiet, concluded to let the detachment from Panama come as far as Mamei and then return. Before having the United States troops sent, however, I took the precaution to telegraph to the station-superintendent at Panama as follows :

"DIAZ : Are there any national troops at the station ? If so, ask for a detachment of them to come to Mamei. If they refuse, send the United States troops."

His reply reads : "No national troops at this station." I then said : "Then send United States troops ; start train."

You will see from this that I was careful to ask the needed protection before accepting it from the United States forces. All this was done between 12 and 1 o'clock of the 24th.

The officer in charge of the United States forces in Panama promptly sent a detachment of ten men, and also sent a similar guard with the train, leaving Panama at 7 a. m. on the 25th, but as there appeared no sign of further interruption, I then had the guard discontinued, except when passenger trains from connecting steamers have been sent, when it has been sent out as far as Mamei and returned from there to Panama. Toward night on the 24th I received a telegram from Captain Dow, as follows : "I have seen President Neira, who regrets the circumstances related by Mr. Fry." To which I replied, "I think that the President's 'regrets' hardly atone for the interference of this morning with Mr. Fry and the train."

Soon after the commencement of hostilities, the force of Colombian national troops, called the battalion "Sapaderes," sent to and maintained on the Isthmus for the protection of the transit, joined the state forces, and are still in the ranks opposed to the rebels or outsiders. Had it not been for the presence and prompt action of the United States naval forces, under the command of Admiral Almy, the interests of this company and of the transit generally would have been at the mercy of an armed mob of semi-savages, and it is not difficult to predict the result. As it is, our thanks are due to the United States forces.

Since the first day, September 24, we have been able to keep up a show of work at Panama, although under many difficulties and drawbacks.

Refugees from the city and suburbs have crowded into the station for shelter and protection to the number of several hundred, mostly women and children.

The United States military force has contributed to make the station a scene of constant bustle, excitement, and confusion, so far as work has been concerned, and the only wonder is how Mr. Hunt has managed to do so well as he has. It must be remembered that all of this time, since the night of September 23, eleven days to-day, communication with the city by land has been entirely cut off, rendering it necessary for all our officers and clerks to go backward and forward between their homes and the station by water, which could only be done at high tide.

I am, your obedient servant,

TRACY ROBINSON,
Acting Superintendent.

Mr. Robinson to Mr. Keeler.

RISEING STAR, Aspinwall, October 6, 1873.

DEAR SIR: At 11.20 a. m. of this date I received telegram from Captain Dow, of which the following is copy :

"During last night the entire rebel force evacuated its position in suburbs, literally stole away and is now said to be at its old quarters beyond the Rio Grande. I walked this morning from the city to the depot for the first time in twelve days. I think there is no doubt but that the rebels are out of ammunition and have retired until such time as they can renew the fight with fresh supplies. In the mean time peace may be negotiated. Communication with the city by land is now open."

From this you will gain an idea of the present situation. The strife may be at an end and may not. Meanwhile we can only hope for the best. Commander Brown, commanding the United States forces on shore at Panama, telegraphed me at the same time that it was thought by himself and Captain Dow unnecessary to keep a larger force than fifty men on shore to protect the company's property, in which I acquiesced, and at 4 this p. m. the balance were sent back on board.

I have written a letter to Admiral Almy, copy of which you will find among my inclosures. It seems but proper that I should convey the sense of obligation the company is under.

The various questions which have arisen affecting the company in its relations to the state and national governments have been all referred to Admiral Almy for solution, inasmuch as he had assumed military control of the transit and must therefore be held responsible for its safety. This we have been all the more willing to concede, as it has relieved us of an important share of the very pressing and grave responsibilities inseparable from the situation; and I am happy to say that, so far as I am at present informed, no just cause of complaint has been given these people by any act of commission or omission on our part. Day and night we have been vigilant to guard the interests of the company and at the same time to preserve the strictest neutrality.

It seems more than probable to me that the present cessation of hostilities is owing to the strict watch we have kept in the matter of smuggling ammunition to the rebels. On the 30th September, it occurred to me that it would be well to keep a sharp lookout, and I requested Mr. Wise to examine carefully every package of local cargo which might contain contraband. As a result, he came back to me the same day and reported having discovered something wrong in a shipment of 10 barrels flour, made by Mr. J. F. Cespedes of this place, examination showing that something besides flour was in the barrels. They were allowed to go forward, however, with instructions to Mr. Hunt to examine, who found each barrel to contain 2,000 cartridges, more or less, all destined for the outside party. This fact having come to the knowledge of General Neira's government, there was an awakening on their part to an extra vigilance, going so far as to even request me not to receive or allow to be transported to Panama, from Aspinwall or the line, any cargo whatever, of a local character; a request, by the way, I could not comply with, but so far as anything suspicious has been concerned, I have taken good care not to allow it to be received.

Of course, this long interruption has caused an accumulation of Panama cargo, which now amounts to well-nigh 1,000 tons, and which up to the present remains on our hands.

Mr. Hunt reports freight-house full and 36 loaded cars on station, while we have the cargoes of two sailing-vessels, the Osprey and a French bark, a large part of which is for Panama, besides constant arrivals.

This stoppage has also interfered seriously in the matter of funds with which to meet our payments. Mr. Hunt's collections have almost entirely ceased for the past two weeks, and it is uncertain how soon he may be able to collect September bills. It has, therefore, been necessary for us to draw for money rather than defer our payments, which I trust will be approved.

I am your obedient servant,

TRACY ROBINSON,
Acting Superintendent.

ASPINWALL, October 6, 1873.

SIR: I beg you will pardon my delay in making this formal acknowledgment of the very great debt of obligation under which you have placed the Panama Railroad Company, of which I have the honor to be the temporary representative on the Isthmus.

Verbally on the 27th ultimo I requested Commander Brown to transmit so much in substance to you, and nothing but an unremitting pressure of care, coupled with illness, has prevented my earlier acknowledgment, in this form, of what I may be permitted to call the invaluable services rendered by yourself and the officers and men of the United States Navy under your command in the protection of the transit during these troubled times. With the hope of having the privilege of thanking you in person,

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

TRACY ROBINSON,
Acting Superintendent Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. Dow to Mr. Keeler.

PANAMA, October 7, 1873.

DEAR SIR: In continuation of my respects, No. 74, by previous steamer, on the political condition of affairs here, I now beg to report the following events, as having transpired since that time.

At the time of closing the letter referred to, rumors were rife that the rebel party intended attacking the city the same night, (22d,) and so convinced of this was the inside party, that the president of the state sent to the United States consul a verbal request to ask the admiral, commanding United States force in these waters, to land a force from the United States steamer Pensacola and the Benicia for the protection of foreign interests in this city, and the property of the railroad at the station.

The night of the 22d passed without any offensive movement on the part of the rebels.

Late in the afternoon of the following day, (23d,) the admiral sent on shore to this depot an effective force of one hundred and twenty men, and two howitzer guns, upon the arrival of which the Federal squad of fifteen men, mentioned in my last, were withdrawn to the city.

About 1 a. m. on the 24th, the rebel forces secretly left their camp, and approaching the city under cover of the darkness, opened fire on it from the windows, and from loopholes made in the stone walls of the houses which they had taken possession of in the suburbs.

The government, expecting an attack, had already for some days had its force disposed in houses along the line of the city walls, and from these sheltered positions the fire of the rebels was returned. All through the following day, and through all the succeeding nights and days, the fire was kept up, with occasional intermissions on both sides until last night, when the rebels vacated their positions and retired in good order to their camp at Faufau, beyond the Rio Grande, where it is said they will remain until peace is made by negotiation, or until with re-enforcements of men and materials they can renew the fight with better chances of success. Fighting as they have been on both sides from behind stone walls, the list of killed and wounded is small. For these particulars I must refer you to the newspapers which go forward by this mail.

Referring to the United States naval force on shore, I may remark that on the 23d, as already stated, there were landed one hundred and twenty officers and men and two howitzers from the flag-ship Pensacola. On the 25th this force was increased to one hundred and sixty-six officers and men and three howitzers, and on the 26th to two hundred and fifteen officers and men, this last being the maximum number at this depot at any one time.

On the 27th an additional force of twenty-five officers and men with a howitzer were disembarked from the Benicia and sent to the cabildo, or city hall, accompanied by seventy-two officers and men with one howitzer from the depot, making the total force on shore two hundred and forty men and four guns, one hundred and forty-three of which from the Pensacola were continued at the depot.

On the 4th all the Benicia's men returned to their ship, and on the 6th instant (yesterday) the force at the dept was reduced to seventy-nine officers and men with two howitzers, which is the only force now remaining on shore.

The commanding officer on shore has suggested to the admiral, now that the rebel force has retired and communication with the city by land is again open and unrestricted, and the fighting between the belligerents is virtually over, for the present at least, that this last-named force be still further reduced to twenty-five officers and men with one howitzer, which is quite sufficient and may be necessary for moral effect, in which I agree with him. The officers and men from the Pensacola, those now here, have been on shore two weeks to-day, and, as a matter of course, they are anxious to return.

Before closing this part of my letter, referring to the political and military condition of affairs here, I may be permitted to say of our naval officers and men, who have been the guardians of the company's valuable and exposed property, that they came promptly and cheerfully to its protection. Exposed as they have been to rain and sun, and insufficient accommodation, I have yet to hear the first murmur of dissatisfaction or discontent from either officer or man. I consider them well entitled to the special thanks of the company.

One more allusion and I am done, and that is to the serious interruption during the continuance of hostilities to the work of embarking and disembarking passengers and freight from our depot-wharf. For the first two or three days after hostilities broke out interruption was almost complete, as it was difficult to find men to do the work. Subsequently the work was carried on with some degree of regularity, but still under great disadvantages, by reason of the presence of many women and children who had abandoned their homes for the security afforded by the wharf and the buildings at the depot.

Another and greater inconvenience than all, and which was constantly attended with danger to the lives of all the officers and clerks of the company, was the cutting off of communication by land with the city, where they all of necessity reside, and which forced them from the morning of the 24th ultimo until yesterday morning, a period of thirteen days, to go backward and forward between the city and the depot-wharf in small boats, and literally under fire of the rebel guns, and hardly a day passed that there were not some to tell their experience of a hair-breadth escape from passing shots while making the passage. Another great inconvenience of this means and course of travel was the tides, which for three hours every day entirely interrupted communication. But, notwithstanding the danger from passing bullets and the many inconveniences to which they were subject, the duties of the different departments at the depot were carried on with as much care and attention as in ordinary times, and the company's interests were not permitted to suffer by neglect.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN M. DOW,
Acting Agent.

SIR: The steamship Washington, which arrived at New York on the 29th ultimo, brought as steerage-passengers six convicts, who had been discharged from prison in Denmark. It is alleged by the commissioner of emigration that they were sent hither by the Danish government, their fares having been paid by the police authorities of Copenhagen. The names of these persons are Frederick Oskar Hielen, Christian Johan, Edward Möller, Niels Steffenson, Ola Leonhard Bachmann, Peter Petersen, and Frederick Wilhelm Schulian. Each of these convicts had in his possession a draft for $7.60, drawn by N. P. Fredericksen on the American Emigrant Company.

All but Schulian have been prevented from landing, and will be returned to Copenhagen by the Washington, sailing on Saturday next.

You are instructed to bring these facts before the Danish government, and also to have a rigid inquiry made into this case. This Government cannot but suppose that the commissioners of emigration are in error in supposing that His Majesty's government has participated in this unusual and unfriendly act.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Referring to my No. 146, respecting the Danish convicts sent to New York from Copenhagen by the Washington, I have now to inform you that Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone had an interview with Mr. Davis on the subject at the Department to-day.

Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone said that he understood that this Government was going to send back to Copenhagen some Danish emigrants.

Mr. Davis replied that it was true that this Government had refused permission to land some Danish convicts who had been sent out here.

Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone said that the persons referred to had served out their terms as convicts, and had come like other emigrants.

Mr. Davis answered that the information received by this Government was not exactly to that effect, and he asked Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone whether he had any personal knowledge on the subject.

Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone replied that he had not, except that he was informed that the persons had served out their terms as convicts. If they had been sent here, it was doubtless by some persons who desired to reform them, or possibly by the police, certainly not by the government; and he suggested that, if we would consent to defer sending the convicts away, it would give an opportunity for inquiry.

Mr. Davis replied that it was not for a moment to be supposed that the Danish government had sent these persons here; we felt sure that it could not have been a party to so unfriendly an act. But we were convinced that the persons were convicts, although they might have served out their terms; and we felt equally sure that they were not voluntary emigrants, but had been sent here. If, therefore, Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone could give no assurances to the contrary, we thought it due to his government to send the persons back, in order that it might have the means of investigating the subject, and an opportunity to punish those who had sent them here. He added that you would receive full instructions on the subject, and that this Government would not consent to make this country a refuge for either paupers or convicts. These persons, therefore, would go back to-morrow, unless Mr. Hegermann Lindencrone could give an assurance that we were mistaken in their character.

Concerning the one-thousandth anniversary of the settlement of Iceland. (From the London Times of August 7, 1874.)

[From an occasional correspondent.]

REYKJAVIK, July 29.

I write to-day under difficulties, for we have had a mighty tossing to go through on our onward progress since we left Faroe last Monday at 4 o'clock in the morning. Having glided along a perfectly calm, almost satin sea, for some hours, unmistakable indications of a rising south-southwest wind began to manifest themselves, and before long these manifestations had found a final realization in a tolerably stiff gale, accompanied by a sea such as only the North Atlantic can roll up when the wind has traveled on for a long time. But the gallant little steamer pushed onward, upward, northward, through a succession of alternate glooms of passing fogs and brightening lifts on the horizon. Late on the 28th the Westmen's Isles (Vesmanneyjar) broke suddenly through the general dimness and uncertainty of the view, with their jagged sky-line and abrupt precipices. Having in vain attempted for an hour to rouse the inhabitants, for the purpose of being piloted into the harbor, we put to sea again, and early the following morning we found ourselves hurled by gale and a terrific sea along the mountain-range tapering off into the Reykjanes. We anchored in the bay of Reykjavik shortly after 4 o'clock to-day, and soon found ourselves in the shingly streets of the capital of Iceland. The name of the place means Reekwick or Steam-bay, and is derived from some hot springs in the neighborhood. Every house in the place is built in the gable-style of architecture, if such manner of house-building deserves indeed such an artistic-sounding name. The shore is lined with the store-houses of the merchants, each of whom is a seller of everything for which he can find market in the country, with the exception of medicines, which are sold by monopoly, under the supervision of the state. Some of these stores aspire to a certain degree of loftiness—loftiness for Iceland, mind—and have their façades, painted in various degrees of dull shades, when not simply covered over with tar, turned sea-ward, with their one or two rows of small square windows, admitting light on the principle of saving, and air on the principle of resistance. The foreshore is traversed by some half-dozen "bridges" or piers, at which landing is effected in boats from the ships lying in the roads. As you land and enter the capital you find that it is regularly built, along straightly laid out streets, with open gutters on either side of the main road, directly under the windows of the houses which line the streets, the windows, in the majority of cases, being so low that you can see into and through the houses as you pass on.

There are public buildings in Reykjavik, but not many; such are the college, the public library, the cathedral, the hospital, the printing-press—a national property—the governor's residence, and the jail. The most important in size is the college—a square, uninteresting building of wood, brick, and lime, already tottering to its fall in the twenty-ninth year of its existence. The cathedral, another modern building of a nondescript sort of style of architecture, stands also on the verge of its collapse, the building having been completed in the same year as that of the college. It appears the builders of these edifices were not aware that mixing salt sea-sand with the mortar must necessarily destroy them in a short time, nor that, unless means were adopted for arresting the capillary attraction, the humidity ascending from the damp soil of undrained Reykjavik must necessarily accelerate the destruction at an incalculably rapid rate. The fate of these buildings seems likely to be shared very soon by the lately-erected public library, a stone structure in the immediate vicinity of the college, which already has accumulated in the porous stone of which the walls are made such an amount of damp that the walls in winter grow alternately rimy and dripping according to the changes of the atmosphere from thaw to frost, or the reverse. This building was erected only a few years ago, out of funds bequeathed for the purpose by the late Mr. Kellsall, of London, who is also reported to have bequeathed his library to Iceland at the same time. His money has come to hand; his books are probably still on the way. The residence of the governor, in common with many other institutions of the world, traces its history back to humble origin, having served as a house of correction, until it was found that the country was barren of criminal, as, indeed, of any other productiveness, and the edifice arose from its aimless humility to do service for a higher purpose. This year it will be elevated into the rank of a royal residence for the first time in its history.

Socially speaking, the capital of Iceland consists of three main elements, the civil and ecclesiastical functionaries, the mercantile community, and the so-called Tómthússmenn (i. e. empty-house men,) people who cultivate no grass and, consequently, keep no cow. The absence of the cow from an Icelandic household constitutes its "emptiness." A fourth class might, perhaps, deserve mention, namely, the class of the poor, which is here pretty numerous, the support of whom falls very heavily on the community at large. The class of the civil functionaries is made up of the governor, Landshöfðingi, the governor of the West and East, who receives the title of Amtmadr (from German Amt) yfir Sodr og Vestramti, the mayor (bæjarfógeti), the so-called Landsskrifari, or official secretary to the governor; the postmaster, the Landfogesi, or public accountant, and several others of minor prominence in the administrative community. The ecclesiastical element is represented by the bishop, the learned Right Rev. Dr. Pjetursson, the head master of the Theological Seminary; Mr. Melsted, a layman, strange to say, and his three assistant masters, and the dean of the cathedral. A sort of intermediate link between the civil functionaries and the ecclesiastical representatives is formed by the college masters, at the head of whom the learned Jón Thorkelsson has lately been placed by the government of Denmark. These men, together with the resident students and graduates, form the literary aristocracy of Reykjavik. The commercial community plays a part in the social life of the place far beyond that which its education and literary attainments would elsewhere entitle it to. The fact is that this is the wealthy class of the town, and finds by its wealth the way to the fore, which otherwise would be barred to it. The greater number of these people are Danes; but their number and influence, though still considerable, are fast waning here as elsewhere, before the national co-operative associations, which of late years have sprung up over the country, with a view to wrenching the trade of the island out of the hands of the Danes. The attempt promises to be successful, and will in that case have a wonderfully improving effect upon the country generally, as all the moneys which are now drawn out of the country by the Danish merchants at Copenhagen will find circulation and employment in the country itself, and thereby will largely contribute to the awakening of the yet dormant spirit of enterprise in these latitudes. The class of the Tómthússmenn is, generally speaking, the fishing class; it outnumbers all the other classes put together, and supplies exclusively the paupers of the place. The habitations of these empty-house men are mostly sod-thatched cots with a wooden gable, facing the road in front of them, through which a door lends access to the interior, where, on the ground, is found the kitchen, the pantry, and the guest-stove or guest-chamber, while an ascent is effected aloft by a ladder to the dormitory of the family, which is generally divided into two portions, with a partition of deal-panelling between; man and wife, and sometimes children, occupying one portion, and the servants the other. Air is invariably admitted in a far too miserly measure, and the space allowed for breathing inside these houses is calculated to cripple life in its tender stages and to breed fever and pestilence. It speaks volumes for the purity and vitality of the Icelandic atmosphere that these habitations should be tenanted by a generally able-bodied and tolerably healthy population. The main reason for this is, no doubt, that these "empty houses" are built on the two eminences which from east and west rise above the low dale in which the heart of the town is situated, the substratum, moreover, being lava heaped together more or less loosely, so that water runs not only rapidly down the hillsides, but also rapidly through the soil. Reykjavik presents by no means the aspect of a community spending a life of an unbroken and misty dullness. There are evening parties here of not unfrequent occurrence, although generally arranged on the principle of social exclusiveness, and family dances and public balls generally enliven the long nights of winter. Private theatricals, too, form a large item in the midwinter pastimes, and are open to the public at a low rate of payment, and are, as I need not add, eagerly sought and attended.

In summer the life is more or less one of change and excitement in various degrees owing to the growing influx of foreign tourists and other visitors, as well as the common custom of utilizing every fair Sabbath for social excursions on horseback into the country, and complaints are sometimes heard of these excursions being more numerous attended than the cathedral church.

JULY 30.

It was perhaps well that I could not continue in bed after 5 o'clock this morning, as I have had an opportunity of witnessing alone and undisturbed the loyal solicitude wherewith these unsophisticated subjects of King Christian IX mean to welcome him to-day. In every direction hands are busy removing from the not over-cleanly streets of Reykjavik whatever eyesores may possibly meet the casual glance of the sovereign. The gutters are cleaned out and the refuse removed to such a distance that pollution of the sweet air of the place is impossible. Flag-staffs are being arranged, now attached to the house-tops, now slantingly thrust out of open windows. The pier where His Majesty is to land is decorated with red cloth under foot, and festoons are hung on either side of it supported on poles, and terminating in what is meant to represent a gate of honor. The festoons are made of homely herbs, chiefly heather of various kinds, interspersed here and there with tiny Alpine flowers, which give a delicate relief to the heavy heather-bloom. Altogether, these festoons are very tastefully arranged and knit in quite an artistic manner. The gate of honor represents a canopy resting on bare wooden poles and terminating in a red cushion at the top supporting a crown. To the right of the pier is erected a stand for the fair sex, where, as they are not expected to cheer His Majesty, it being considered an unladylike proceeding, they are to wave him their welcome with white handkerchiefs. A watchman is already stationed on an eminence above Reykjavik at the so-called college-beacon, whose business is to give the signal when His Majesty is sighted for the ships in the harbor to decorate. The harbor itself presents an unusually festive appearance. There is a German man-of-war sent specially for the occasion; a Swedish, under the command of Admiral Lagerkrantz; a Norwegian, with a deputation on board of Norwegian students, litterateurs, and poets, the latter two sent by order of King Oscar of Sweden. Then there are two French men-of-war and a Danish gunboat, besides a goodly variety of other craft of various sizes. Shortly before 1 o'clock the Jylland passed through the assembled men-of-war, from the manned yards of which there re-echoed a loud and long hurrah. As soon as she had dropped anchor, Governor Finsen went on board to pay a visit to His Majesty, and soon returned with the message that he would land punctually at 2 p. m.

At 2 o'clock precisely the first king who ever set foot on Iceland stepped ashore in the person of His present Majesty of Denmark. On the pier he was received by the corporation of the town of Reykjavik and by the public functionaries resident in the town. He had expressed a wish to the governor that he might not receive an address, but the short address here following was presented:

"Most Gracious King: At the moment Your Majesty steps ashore in Iceland—the first king who, during the thousand years this country has been inhabited, has set its foot on its soil—I may be permitted, in the name of the whole country, and especially in the name of the town of Reykjavik, to bid Your Majesty a cordial welcome.

"Most Gracious King: Iceland is a poor country, considering the scarcity of its inhabitants and the condition of their material comforts; but if regard be had to the memories of the past thousand years, then Iceland is a wealthy country, and it abounds no less in loyal faith and love to Your Majesty. Our millennial festivity, therefore, becomes double glorious, both by Your Majesty's presence and participation therein and by the free constitution wherewith it has pleased Your Majesty to inaugurate this jubilee; and thereby the feast has become not only one of memories but one of joy and hope; joy at seeing our beloved ruler among us; hope of a vigorous and happy development of the intellectual and material forces of Iceland.

"Most Gracious King: By these two events Your Majesty has created for yourself in the history of Iceland a memory which will never fade away, but will be faithfully cherished in a grateful recollection as long as this country exists. Every Icelander meets Your Majesty, therefore, with jubilant 'welcome,' and prays Almighty God to let his blessing descend abundantly over Your Majesty and your royal house.

"Long live our beloved King, His Majesty King Christian IX."

To this address His Majesty replied, to the effect that there had never existed a doubt as to the sincerity of the attachment of the Icelanders to their sovereign. It was to him a matter of great joy to find himself amid his faithful Icelanders, and he hoped the constitution he had brought with him would prove a powerful aid toward what he had especially at heart—the intellectual and material development of his beloved Icelandic subjects.

After this reply had been delivered, the governor introduced the official assembly on the pier, whereupon His Majesty walked up towards the assembled crowds and was greeted by a loud Icelandic cry from the multitude, "Long live our King Christian IX," while the women wafted unsparingly their white kerchiefs, thus giving a sparkling kind of effect to the welcome, which was really a very enthusiastic one for Iceland. His Majesty was now escorted on foot, preceded by the mayor of Reykjavik, to the place where he had intimated it was his pleasure to reside during his stay in the country, and as he approached the gate another crowd, apparently as numerous as that which had greeted him at the pier, received him with repeated and hearty cheers, to which he graciously bowed his pleasure. Approaching the door, he was met by Mrs. Finsen, who in a very homely but exceedingly graceful manner came down the steps leading up the terrace to the entrance and bade her Sovereign and guest "many times welcome." Immediately on entering the house His Majesty gave audience to the public functionaries and the corporation of Reykjavik, whereupon the official and formal proceedings of the day came to an end.

His Majesty is accompanied by his son, Prince Waldemas, and several distinguished persons, such as Chamberlain Baron Holten, Adjutant Hedemann, Mr. Klein, who is to be minister for Iceland from next Saturday (August 1;) Professor Steenstrup, the antiquarian; Professor Sorensen, a famous Danish sea-painter; the young poet, Carl Andersen, who acts as interpreter to His Majesty, and several others. Among the distinguished Danes not of the royal suite who have come to witness the proceedings, I may mention the learned Dr. Rosenberg, a phenomenon among his people, as being the only one who has had the courage persistently to advocate the cause of Iceland against Denmark, and Mr. Kaufman, a young poet who has brought Iceland on this occasion the best poetical greeting it has received from Denmark. Of the Norwegian deputation I will content myself with mentioning Mr. Kildal, Mr. Rolfson, Mr. Janson, the poet, and Mr. Storm, who has lately obtained the gold medal of the Royal Society of Sciences of Copenhagen for a work on the sources of Snorri Sturluson's Heimskringla. These Norwegians are all men of ability, Mr. Kildal and Mr. Rolfson particularly having won great names among the people for fiery eloquence as Janson has for poetry. I should become too much of a mechanical chronicler if I were to enumerate the number of people who have come here on this occasion as representatives of foreign journalism. But as a curiosity I cannot refrain from mentioning that a Russian paper of St. Petersburg and a Hungarian paper of Buda-Pesth have sent each a correspondent here.

AUGUST 1.

To-day a great change is made, theoretically at least, in the relations between Iceland and Denmark. Iceland ranks now among the constitutional entities of political Europe. The constitution which was promulgated on the 5th of January last comes, or rather has come, into force to-day, according to the provisions of its last paragraph. It was, perhaps, wise of the advisers of the King not to introduce it with any pomp or ceremony this morning, for that ceremony would have thrown a damper on all the succeeding ceremonies, which have, in reality, nothing to do with the constitutional change. It is not necessary here to go through the history of the long struggle which preceded the eventual grant of the constitution. On the part of the King the grant becomes an act of gracious generosity; for it is a well-known fact that the King has never thrown himself in the way of the wishes of his Icelandic subjects in this matter. The question has never met with any resistance from the dynasty, but only from the national liberal party in Denmark, whose object it has been all along to make the Icelanders the subjects of the Danish subjects of their King. There has been so much said about the liberty granted by this constitution that I cannot do better than give an accurate précis of the more important of its provisions, in order to let the reader judge for himself.

This document, which purports to regulate only home affairs, is divided into seven chapters. Chapter 1, sections 1 to 13, deals with the relation between the King and the government on one side and the legislative assembly, the althing, on the other. Paragraph 1 provides that the legislative power rests with the King and the althing, the executive power with the King, and the judicial power with the judges. Iceland has no voice in imperial questions, while it is not represented at the Rigsdag at Copenhagen, and consequently pays nothing toward imperial expenditure. 2. The King has supreme power in all home affairs, with such restrictions as are provided in this constitution, and executes that power through the minister for Iceland. The highest power in Iceland is to be given to the governor, (Landshöfdingi), who is appointed by the King. 3. The minister is to be responsible for the constitution being faithfully observed. The althing, on its part, has to call the minister to account, according to rules to be framed hereafter. If the althing have reason to complain of the manner in which the governor brings his power to bear, the King decides, should the althing demand it, in each particular case, whether and how he may be called to account for his acts. 4. The King grants all such offices as he has granted hitherto. This may be altered by law. No one is to be appointed to a public office in Iceland unless he be a Danish subject by birth and have the requisite knowledge of the language. Every functionary is to take oath to the constitution. 5. The King summons the althing to a session every other year. Without special royal consent the session may not last longer than six weeks at a time. 6. The King can summon an extraordinary session of the althing when he pleases, and decides how long such a session is to last. 7. The King can prorogue the regular althing for a certain time, but never longer than four weeks, unless the althing consent to it, and never more than once a year. 8. The King can dissolve the althing, in which case new elections shall be called within two months from the date of dissolution, and the althing be summoned for the next year following the dissolution. 9. The King can order draughts of bills and resolutions to be laid before the althing. 10. The consent of the King is requisite before any resolution of the althing can acquire the force of law. The King takes care that the laws be promulgated and obeyed. If the King have not sanctioned a draught of a bill passed by the althing before the next regular session of the althing, it is thereby annulled. 11. When especial need requires, the King can issue ad interim laws between two regular sessions of the althing. Such laws may not, however, conflict with the constitution, and in all cases they must be laid before the next althing. 12. The King has the power of reprieve and of general amnesty. 13. The King grants, directly or through the proper officials, privileges and exemptions from the law, according to the rules by which such questions have been regulated heretofore.

According to Chapter II, sections 14-18, as to the constitution and composition of the althing, thirty deputies are to be elected by the nation, and six chosen by the King. The number of the deputies elected by the people may be altered by law. The election of the deputies is generally valid for a period of six years, the commission of those chosen by the King to remain unaffected in case of dissolution. If a deputy die or a seat be otherwise vacated, the commission of the new member is to last only for the remainder of the period for which the althing then sitting is elected.

These royal commissioners have given very keen offense to the Icelanders, who are intensely loyal, and take the provision as an affront. Remonstrances have already appeared in print against this particular measure, and loud protestations to the effect that no royal functionary could be got to sit in the name of the King more loyal than any of the national deputies chosen at random. The effect will only be to create bad blood by creating an artificial opposition, the object of which could not be to defend any royal or dynastic interests, which require no defense in Iceland, but to back up a Danish minister in anti-national and Danizing tendencies.

This particular provision is borrowed from the Danish constitution of 1849. In Denmark, where it is well known the people are leavened through and through by republican elements, it may be necessary; but for the Icelanders, an aristocratic community throughout, and, like all people who have a compact historical tradition, strongly conservative in a national direction, the provision is, politically speaking, entirely off the mark, and mischievous from every point of view considered. 15. The althing is divided into two houses, the upper and lower. In the upper house twelve members have seats; in the lower, twenty-four. These numbers, however, may be altered by law. 16. The (six) king-chosen deputies have all seats in the upper house; the other six are chosen out of the number of the national deputies by the whole althing (both houses joined) for the whole period to which the elected althing extends. If a seat of a national deputy be vacant in the upper house during the period to which the althing has been elected, then, when the electoral district has returned its member, both houses of the althing meet in order to elect a deputy to the vacated seat in the upper house. Seventeen and eighteen regulate the franchise and define the civil conditions of those who are eligible to the althing; but they introduce no new regulations beyond those in force already.

Chapter III, sections 19 to 41, defines the legislative functions and co-operation of the two houses. 19. The regular althing shall meet the first working-day in July every other year, unless the King has previously fixed some other day for the meeting. 20. The place of meeting shall be Reykjavik. Under peculiar circumstances the King may fix upon another spot for the meeting. 21. Each chamber has a right to propose and pass draughts of bills; as either also has a right to send an address to the King. 22. Either house has a right, during the session of the althing, to appoint commissions in order to investigate matters of general interest. Either house can enable such commissions to demand information, by word of mouth or in writing, as they choose, both from public functionaries and private individuals. 23. No tax may be imposed, altered, or removed, except by law. No loan compulsory on the nation may be made, nor any national property be sold or transferred, unless sanction be given thereto by law. 24. No item of expenditure may be paid unless it be authorized in the general or the extraordinary budget. 25. As soon as the regular althing meets, a budget for the next biennial finance period shall be laid before it. Among the income shall be entered both the fixed contribution and the sinking contribution, which, according to the law regulating the position of Iceland in the realm, of the 2d of January, 1871, sections 5 and 6, is paid toward the home affairs of Iceland, yet in such a manner that the expenditure out of this contribution toward the highest public functionaries in the country and the royal commissary at the althing takes precedence of every other expenditure from the same. The draught of the budget to be laid always first before the lower house. The sting of this paragraph will not be understood by outsiders without an explanation.

The "contribution" here mentioned is the sum which the legislative assembly of Denmark at last paid over to Iceland from the sums which the latter claimed out of the Danish treasury as belonging to Iceland by absolute right. When it was impossible to dispute this right any longer, Denmark settled to pay one-fourth of what Iceland claimed, and a sinking-fund beside, and then passed an arbitrary law, which provided that by this arrangement the whole financial dispute was at an end—a law against which the althing has formally protested as not binding except for Denmark. Now, in order to choose some convenient name for this long-withheld payment, it is called a "contribution," and considered in this constitutional instrument as belonging to Denmark. Hence the primary object of it is to defray the emoluments of those who are supposed to stand in the most tender relations to that country—not to the King, necessarily, at all. It is strange almost beyond conception that disingenuous considerations of this kind should be allowed by any legislator to enter into such a momentously-important document as the constitution of a people's rights and liberties. 26. Either house elects an auditor, who is to be paid for his work. 27. No draught of a bill can be finally passed until it has been read three times in either house. 28. When a draught of a bill has been passed in one house, it shall be laid before the other in the form in which it was passed. If it then receive any alterations, it passes, with these, back to the house it came from. If alterations be still made, it goes back to the house it came from last. And if at this stage no agreement can be effected, both chambers form one house, wherein the affair is finally passed after one debate. But in order that a decision thus arrived at by the althing be lawful, it is requisite that two-thirds of the members of each house be present at the sitting and take part in the voting, in which case a simple majority rules the decision in the voting of each individual paragraph; but in order that a draught of a bill—saving the budget—be finally passed in toto, it is requisite that at least two-thirds of the votes given be in favor of the draught of the bill. Consequently, since two-thirds of each house must be present at the final debate on a hard-contested bill, it will always be perfectly legal and perfectly easy for any four members of the upper house, by their absence, to destroy utterly the legislative power of the country in such cases. 29. The althing decides itself as to the legality of the election of its members. 30. Every new member shall take his oath to the constitution immediately on his election being declared valid. 31. The members are only bound by their own conviction, but by no rules from their electors. Public functionaries are eligible to the althing, but must, if they accept the election, see that their offices are taken charge of while they are away, in such manner as may be satisfactory to the government. 32. During the session of the althing no member can be taken up for debt unless the chamber to which he belongs sanction the process; nor may he be put in prison, nor may a lawsuit be instituted against him, unless he has been taken in a criminal act. No member can be called to account out of the althing for language used in debate unless the house to which he belongs permit it. 33. If a member, lawfully elected, fall under such circumstances as carry with them forfeiture of eligibility, the right entailed by the election ceases thereby. 34. The governor shall have the right, in consequence of his official position, to take a seat in the althing and speak as often as he chooses, obeying, however, the rules of the house—an exceedingly unconstitutional provision, and one against which protests have been uttered already. It is, however, improved upon by an additional clause, according to which the government reserves for itself a right to commission a person to meet with the governor in the althing ex latere, ostensibly to supply the althing with such reports and information as it may demand from the governor, but in reality the clause is inserted with a view to furnishing a Danish governor with an interpreter. In other words, it is constitutionally declared that the office is not to be trusted to an Iclander. 35 to 41 are of no special interest.

Chapter IV, sections 42 to 44. Regulations for the judiciary powers.

Chapter V, sections 45 to 47. Regulations for the state church, the Evangelical Lutheran, and for religious denominations.

Chapter VI, sections 48 to 60. Various constitutional provisions relating to the freedom of the subject, the sanctity of home and private property, free exercise of industry, poor-law, elementary education, freedom of the press, freedom of association and assembly, rights of municipal government, taxation, and privileges which go with nobility, titles, and high position, all of which are to cease henceforth.

Chapter VII, section 31. Propositions with a view to altering or adding to this present constitution may be moved in an ordinary or extraordinary sitting of the althing at will. If such a proposition receive the due majority in both houses, the althing shall be dissolved forthwith and new elections called out. If the newly-elected althing give its consent to the proposition unamended, and if it obtain the royal sanction, it comes into force as part and parcel of the constitutional law. 62. This constitution comes into force on the 1st of August, 1874.

It is easy for any one who knows what political freedom is to realize for himself how far this is a liberal constitution or not. Most thinking politicians will regret that so slight an amount of reliance on the good faith of the Icelanders should be embodied in it. But slender as its liberality is, it opens to the people a new school in politics, and even the experience which that school must necessarily bring to the benefit of the nation is always worth something.

• AUGUST 2.

This was not probably, but absolutely, the most solemn Sunday that this hyperborean people has seen for a thousand years. Harbor and town had put on an extra festive appearance. Every ship in the roads was decorated; every house ashore was decorated; every individual one met was decorated. At half past 10 the ceremony in the church was to begin, and, by virtue of the distinguished friends in whose company I made the trip to Iceland, I had a reserved seat set apart for myself and them in the cathedral, where eye and ear could best enjoy what passed during the solemnity. On approaching the cathedral a goodly number of mariners had been stationed outside to greet the sovereign. The crowd was very thick, but devoutly silent. We threaded our way through it and presented our tickets to the police stationed at the door, and were respectfully bidden to proceed to our allotted pew in the northern aisle. Sitting here silently and reviewing the scene, I had an opportunity of paying a close regard to the exceedingly tasteful decorations of the decrepit cathedral. Had I not been in it the day before and seen the ruinous state of the cemented walls, I could not have believed but that I was in a new church erected for the occasion. All along the front of the aisle galleries green festoons of thickly interwoven heather and Alpine herbage passed from column to column, supported by branched candlesticks from which wax tapers threw a subdued glare amid the bright daylight inside. The governor's pew, made royal for the occasion, was decorated in cloth and flowers in a manner for the taste and elegance of which I could not have given Reykjavik the credit had I not seen it myself. In like manner the apse, the altar, and the chancel were all bedecked with flowers and folded drapery, and the whole cathedral could only give one uniform impression—that of devotion to the august guest of the occasion. The service being an extraordinary one, (there were three services this day, whereas otherwise there is only one on ordinary Sundays,) the rite observed was an extraordinary one too, and the hymns sung were all specially composed for the occasion by the senior master of the theological college of Reykjavik, Mr. Helgi Hálfðanarson, with the exception of one which had been written by the poet Mattias Jochumsson, and set to music by a young Icelandic musician, Mr. Sveinbjörnsson, of Edinburgh, and declared even by Swedish connoisseurs to be a masterly composition of its kind. The choir of male and female voices mixed was singularly impressive, and every foreigner to whom I spoke coming out bore witness to the exceeding devotional and tender character of the singing, and the corresponding behavior of the congregation. The sermon was preached by the Right Reverend Bishop P. Pjetursson, while the dean of the cathedral, Mr. Sveinson, officiated at the altar.

At half-past 3 in the afternoon the people of Reykjavik assembled in the only square in Reykjavik, called Austrvöllr, or Eastfield, according to the programme of the committee of the Reykjavic festivities, for the purpose of marching in procession to the place called Oskjuhitd, about a mile and a half outside Reykjavik to the eastward, where the fête was to be held. The crowd could not have numbered less than 3,000 people at the least. As the procession moved on it was very interesting to see how eagerly every age strove to avail itself of the rare occurrence. Unfortunately the wind was boisterous; more unfortunately still, the committee had chosen the most exposed point to be found in the neighborhood of Reykjavik; and, most unfortunate of all, the space had been cleared of sward and stone, so that when the crowd arrived it stood in a cloud of dry dust, which in a very short time drove hundreds of the visitors away from the spot, and apparently destroyed, to a large extent, the popularity of the fête. I was too much interested in the proceedings to take any particular heed of either flying earth or dusty garments, and could not help paying my grateful compliments to the committee for their good taste in having fixed upon the finest point of view to be found round Reykjavik for the celebration of the rarest event in the history of the country. When friends and acquaintances had exchanged thoughts and sentiments for awhile, the proceedings began by the mayor of Reykjavik proposing a cheer for the King, who was not present as yet, which was cordially responded to by the assemblage; and then calling upon the senior master of Reykjavik College, Mr. Haldor Fridriksson, to memorialize the occasion by a speech on Iceland from the tribune. Mr. Fridriksson spoke at some length, but his speech was only a dry résumé of the more salient events in the history of the island, without being relieved by one single reflection throughout. It appeared to me a singular, and not altogether insignificant, omission on the part of the speaker, that when he had abruptly finished his speech he descended from the tribune without calling for a cheer for his own country. The omission, however, was speedily mended by some one in the crowd crying out with a stentorian voice, "Long live Iceland free and happy," a cry which was enthusiastically responded to. This speaker was followed by the head-master of the elementary school of Reykjavik, Mr. Helgi Helgasen, who, in an earnest and well-considered speech, proposed "The prosperity of Denmark and of every worthy Dane." The speaker abstained from all political allusions, no doubt on purpose.

Shortly after 7 o'clock the King, who had been entertaining a company of natives and foreigners at dinner, arrived on the spot. By this time the wind had lulled down to an almost imperceptible breeze, and the peculiar blue which, after a dry windy day in Iceland settles upon and softens down distant mountain views, seemed now to envelope the whole horizon in a veil of slumbering peacefulness. As the King ascended the hill he was welcomed by what was meant to be a joyful royal salute, which terminated in all but fatal consequences. Some gunners from the Danish gunboat Fylla had volunteered to fire the royal salute. Six shots went off without anything happening, but the seventh carried off the hand of one of the gunners, and the eighth that of another, when the saluting ceremony came to an end. The misadventure did not come to the ear of the King till the festivity was all over. As soon as His Majesty made his appearance in the crowd he was received with greater enthusiasm than ever, and was conducted, together with his following, up to the tribune, where the former mayor of Reykjavik, Mr. A. Thorsteinson, received him with an eloquent extempore address, which was followed by Mr. Helgasen's choir singing a poem written for the occasion by Mr. Jochumson. The King answered in an exceedingly appropriate speech, expressing his pride at finding himself in the midst of the people who could boast of such memories as the Icelandic people could. He regretted sincerely not to be able to commune with the people in their own language, the once common tongue of the whole North. He hoped the constitution he had brought with him would prove a happy event in the life of the people. He would always cherish in dear memory the loyalty and devotion of his Icelandic subjects, whose welfare and prosperity he took the opportunity of proposing. At these words immense cheering went through the crowd assembled on the top of the hill in the immediate neighborhood of His Majesty, and was taken up by what groups had assembled on the hill-slopes and were as yet but dimly cognizant of what was going on.

After a few more speeches and songs the festivity at Reykjavik came to an end. Tomorrow the King repairs to the Thingvalla fête, where I mean to be beforehand, as horses and luggage are all ready to start at eight to-morrow morning.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Copenhagen, September 5, 1874. (Received September 22.)

SIR: Referring to my No. 159, and its inclosure, of December 28, 1872,* in relation to the introduction into the three Scandinavian kingdoms of a common money system based upon a common gold standard, I have now the honor to inform you that the said common money system described in inclosure A of the said dispatch, having by law been adopted by the kingdom of Denmark, will be introduced and take effect on the 1st of January, 1875.

The Danish minister of finance has, on the 1st of this month, caused an official notice to be published, to the effect that all financial obligations entered into on and after January 1, 1875, shall be done on the basis of the said new money system, and that from and after that date all public and private payments shall be made in accordance with the unit of calculation of that system, namely, the gold crown, containing 100 öre, (or about 26½ cents gold.)

It might, perhaps, be well to inform the financial and commercial world of the United States of the foregoing notice.

I have, &c.,

M. J. CRAMER.

Mr. Hegermann to Mr. Fish.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF DENMARK,
Washington, January 7, 1874. (Received January 9.)

SIR: The Great Northern Telegraph Company of Copenhagen commenced three years since to lay cables in Chinese waters, and its lines now connect the ports of Shanghai and Amoy with each other, and likewise with Japan, Eastern Siberia, and Hong-Kong.

Before commencing the work, the direction of the company addressed Mr. Burlingame, the head of the Chinese embassy, which was then at Copenhagen, asking for information as to whether the landing of cables at Chinese ports would be permitted. Mr. Burlingame having sent the satisfactory reply of which I have the honor to inclose a copy, any further application to the Chinese government in relation to the matter was deemed unnecessary. Although the company has not, for this reason, received a special and official authorization to lay cables along the coasts of China, and to establish telegraph lines and stations in the two aforesaid Chinese ports, the local authorities have, nevertheless, tacitly recognized that the operations of the company are authorized. At Shanghai they have assisted in the prosecution and punishment of Chinese subjects who have been guilty of thefts to the detriment of cables laid in rivers, and whenever telegraph lines have been destroyed or injured by acts of violence, they have promptly lent their aid to the company, and have performed their duties toward it in the most satisfactory manner, which duties have more than once been rendered difficult of performance by the condition of affairs in China and the national prejudice of the population.

Interruptions to the working of cables caused by premeditated acts of violence, have only occurred of late in places which are partly outside of Chinese territory.

The Chinese magistrates have frequently visited the telegraph stations, and, like the native merchants, they have made use of the electric wires for their own correspondence.

The only difficulty that has occurred, until quite recently, was raised by a local magistrate at Amoy, viz, the Tautai, who protested against the telegraph when, at the beginning of last year, the company established a station there.

This protest was followed by no results; but now, according to late advices received from the agent of the company, the Tautai at Shanghai, being irritated, as it appears, on account of an article which had appeared in the English newspaper published in that city, the tenor of which was very offensive to the feelings of the Chinese, has required that the telegraph line which connects Shanghai by land with the little port of Woosung should be removed, and that the station there established should be discontinued.

Mr. Seward, consul-general of the United States, and Mr. Medhurst, consul of England, having objected to these requirements, the Tautai is said to have submitted the matter to the government at Peking.

Although it is to be presumed that this incident will be followed by no results—it might perhaps even exert a beneficial influence upon the extension of telegraphic communication in the interior of China by calling the attention of the government to the great advantages that would accrue therefrom to the country—the direction of the company cannot close its eyes to the fact that its interests in China will always be, in many respects, at the mercy of contingencies and arbitrary proceedings, so long as they shall not be under the protection of influential persons at Peking. The company is convinced that its future in China would be assured, and that the task which it has taken upon itself in the interest of civilization would be considerably lightened, if it could succeed in obtaining effective official support, near the Chinese government, from the legations of the powers represented at Peking, together with the adoption of direct measures in its favor by the Japanese government, which has at all times given evidence of great goodwill toward the company and its operations in Japan, and which, in view of its oriental character and the community of so many interests, must certainly exert a great influence at Peking.

The government of the King, having been solicited to express the desires of the company to the governments represented at Peking, has not thought proper to refuse compliance with this request, in view of the immense importance of the development of telegraphic communication in China to the commerce of the world in that country and in Japan.

It is, therefore, in obedience to the orders of my government that I have the honor, Mr. Secretary of State, to address to you the present communication, for the purpose of begging the Government of the United States to be pleased to grant the powerful support of its legation at Peking to the operations in China of the Great Northern Telegraph Company, for the sake of bringing the Chinese government to recognize and appreciate the great advantages of the ulterior development of telegraphic communication in that country.

I have also received orders to request the Government of the United States to be pleased to use its good offices at Yeddo for the purpose of inducing the government of the Mikado to exert its influence at Peking in favor of the company.

There is one more point which I am instructed to submit to the kind consideration of the Government of the United States.

The company has every reason to believe that some of the interruptions to which the working of the cable is from time to time exposed are due to acts of violence, which are prompted either by thoughtlessness and malevolence or by the calculating spirit of persons interested in stopping telegraphic communication at a given moment.

The company being unable by its own efforts to put a stop to these abuses, which are so detrimental to a regular and secure telegraphic service, it would be of the greatest importance to it to receive from the commanders of squadrons and of vessels stationed in Chinese waters—so far as this might be consistent with their duties—kind and active protection against these violent acts, which can be considered by the civilized world only as piracy and similar crimes, against which it is the duty of vessels of war to protect mankind.

Be pleased to accept, &c.,

J. HEGERMANN LINDENCRONE.

CHINESE LEGATION,
Copenhagen, October 22, 1869.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiring in relation to telegraphs in China, I have to say that in 1865, as United States minister, the Chinese government, refusing to grant a right of way over land, consented that if a line should be laid in the sea it might be landed at the ports. This assent is attested by two interpreters, Dr. W. A. P. Martin and Dr. Williams, eminent sinologues.

By the favored-nation clause in the treaties with China, what is granted to one is granted to all, so that the connection you propose by the way of Possiet with Shanghai may be securely made.

Yours, &c.,

ANSON BURLINGAME.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, January 22, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 7th instant. Under instructions from your government you invite this Government to instruct its legation in China to lend its aid in inducing the Chinese government to recognize and appreciate the great advantages of the ulterior development of telegraphic communication in that country.

Your government has also been pleased to instruct you to ask that the minister of the United States at Yedo may be directed to use his good offices for the purpose of inducing the government of the Mikado to exert its influence at Peking in favor of the Great Northern Telegraph Company at Copenhagen.

And you inform me, under instructions from your government, that it would be of great importance to that company to receive from commanders of squadrons and vessels stationed in Chinese waters, so far as it might be consistent with their duties, protection against violent acts.

The President will take much pleasure in directing the diplomatic representatives of the United States at Yedo and at Peking to report upon the necessity and upon the expediency of any such action by this Government in order to enable him to determine whether, in the absence of a reciprocal treaty in respect to submarine cables, the facts would warrant this Government in actively interfering in the manner requested by your government.

I take the liberty in this connection of reminding you that, as long ago as the 23d of November, 1869, this Government invited that of Denmark to join with it in measures for the protection of submarine cables, and that no reply to these suggestions has been received. The President is still of the opinion that the most efficacious protection would be afforded by means of a joint convention, as then suggested.

May I ask you to kindly recall this matter to the attention of your government?

The government of the King, to which I shall not fail to transmit the contents of your aforesaid note and its inclosures, will be highly gratified by the kind and efficient aid which the minister and the consul of the United States in China were pleased to lend to the Danish company on that occasion.

LEGATION OF DENMARK,
Washington, June 14, 1874. (Received June 19.)

SIR: In the note which you did me the honor to address me under date of the 22d of January last, you expressed a desire to be informed of the views of the government of the King in regard to the draft of an international convention for the protection of submarine cables, which was transmitted to it in the month of December, 1869, by the minister resident of the United States at Copenhagen.

In the month of May, 1870, the royal ministry of foreign affairs sent this legation a communication, with instructions to transmit it to the Government of the United States in relation to said draft. That communication never reached its destination, and it is owing to this unfortunate circumstance that the reply of the King's government has not been laid before you, Mr. Secretary of State, before this.

The views of the government of the King in the matter in question

* For this correspondence, see under "China."

having undergone no modification since that time, I have received orders to communicate to the Government of the United States the following observations, which were contained in the instructions sent to this legation in 1870 :

In articles 1 and 2, it is stipulated that the privilege of laying and working submarine cables can be granted only in pursuance of an agreement between the two countries to be connected by the cables. The government of the King has no objections to advance against this principle, which, on previous occasions, it has usually followed itself; but it is of opinion that, in order to put it in practice, some easier way, and one better suited to the end than the one proposed in the draft, might be adopted. Instead of requiring direct conferences between the governments of two countries very distant, perhaps, from each other, the right might be given to each one of the two countries, by itself, to grant the privilege, with the proviso, however, that it should not be valid unless granted by the other country likewise. It would then become the business of the party receiving the privilege himself to obtain this indispensable requisite; the enterprise would still retain its private character, and would be carried out more rapidly if pushed by the interested party himself, who would, moreover, be better able to obtain satisfactory conditions therefor.

The proposition made in article 3 of the draft, viz, that the governments are to abstain from exercising any control over telegrams sent by international cables, is not in harmony with articles 20 and 21, compared with article 66 of the telegraphic convention concluded July 21, 1866, by the majority of the countries of Europe. The government of the King cannot deprive itself of a right of control which, especially in case of war, might be of great importance to the security of the state. It has reason to believe that other European states share its views on this subject.

Article 5 of the draught must doubtless be understood in this sense, that while an order from the proper authorities might, in the case mentioned under No. 4, exempt the persons in question from punishment, such an order would be without effect in the cases specified under Nos. 1, 2, and 3. In the opinion of the government of the King, it would be more natural to draw up a clause of this importance as an obligation binding upon the governments to issue no orders for the cutting of cables, than to choose the indirect method of saying that the governments engage to punish the guilty parties, whether these have acted in obedience to the orders of their own government or not.

Article 5 of the draft stipulates that the destruction or mutilation of a cable shall be punished as an act of piracy; according to the Danish penal code, the guilty party would, in that case, be condemned to hard labor for life. Such a punishment seems to the government of the King to be excessively severe, and it could not impose, for the crime in question, any penalty more severe than confinement in a house of correction.

Articles 7 and 8 contain stipulations which are not in accordance with the penal code now in force in Denmark, and would consequently require changes for which the government of the King would have to ask the consent of the legislative branch.

In making this formal reservation, the government of the King would not hesitate to adhere to the clauses of the article in question, the modifications to be made in the penal code not being very essential.

It is only as regards article 7 that it is necessary to observe that if the government of the King were eventually to engage to punish a non-Danish subject who, having committed the crime in question on the high seas and on board of a vessel carrying a foreign flag, should afterward be found in Denmark, this obligation could evidently concern only the subjects of the states that should have acceded to the convention. It would be in violation of all international law to extend the jurisdiction of a country, in the case of crimes committed on the high seas, to persons sailing under the flag of a state which had not adhered to the convention.

It is only with these modifications and reservations that the government of the King will be able to conclude a convention for the protection of submarine cables on the basis of the draft presented by the Government of the United States.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Quito, Ecuador, May 15, 1873. (Received June 9.)

SIR: In answer to Circular No. 38 from the State Department, I have the honor to report that I have to-day addressed a note to this government asking for the desired information, and have also made known the change in the American estimate of the English pound sterling for the future, involving an increase of two cents and six and one-half mills (.0265) on former valuation.

The assays and reports made by my predecessor, Hon. Charles R. Buckalew, fully cover this matter as it stands to-day.

No visible improvement has been made in the current circulating coin of Ecuador beyond the recent introduction of a small percentage of our own silver, and a few thousand Peruvian "soles."

The major portion of the coin in use is worn out, and full of holes. Its real intrinsic value is far below the face standard.

As this government is now bent upon raising the standard and introducing a better type of current coin, it has impressed me that it may perhaps be advisable to wait a few months, or a year, until the old money is withdrawn, and the new issue substituted before making a fixed report to the Director of the Mint.

The government of Chili has consented to coin $1,000,000 for Ecuador, and I sincerely hope that our own Government will be finally able to bestow a similar service, as per my dispatch No. 281.

I will report the answer of this government, however, upon its receipt.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Quito, Ecuador, August 28, 1873. (Received October 2.)

SIR: Referring to my dispatch 319, concerning the death of William C. Doval, I desire to make the following statement:

Upon my return from Guayaquil, while lying ill in Ambato, I received a copy of a publication made by certain American citizens resident in Quito, offering a reward of $100 for the detection of the author of a shameful outrage upon the grave of the said Mr. Doval.

I inclose a copy and translation, Nos. 1 and 2, of this document.

So soon after my arrival in Quito as I was able to dictate a note, I addressed a communication (No. 3) on this subject to the government of Ecuador.

After a delay of several days, I received a reply, of which Nos. 4 and 5 are copy and translation.

On the succeeding day I addressed a second note (No. 6) to Minister Leon, on the same subject. In reply thereto I received his note, No. 7, of date 21st of August, of which No. 8 is a translation.

It will be observed that Minister Leon seemed disposed to controvert my statement that the outrage upon the grave of Mr. Doval was the third occurrence of the kind of which I had informed him during my official residence in Quito.

On the succeeding day, however, I was the recipient of a note, of which Nos. 9 and 10 are copy and translation, which, to a considerable extent, precluded the necessity of an answer to Minister Leon's note of the preceding day.

On the night of the 22d of August Minister Leon called at my room where I am still confined with inflammatory rheumatism, and in the presence of the English minister resident, Hon. Frederick Hamilton, stated to me in so many words that, in his note of the same day, he fully meant to admit that I had previously informed him of the outrage upon the grave of Colonel Phineas E. Staunton, assuring me, however, that for the time he had utterly forgotten the facts in relation to the violation of the graves of Mr. Minister Coggeshall and Colonel Staunton, some three or four years since.

These facts the Department will find explicitly set forth in my dispatch No. 29 of September 13, 1870.

I likewise have the honor to inclose copy of a note addressed to me by Minister Hamilton, in regard to the interview between Minister Leon and myself, which incidentally occurred in his presence.

Both Minister Hamilton and myself were of the opinion, upon examination, that Minister Neal's grave had likewise been desecrated.

I am not sure whether the Department is aware of the fact that the bodies of Minister Coggeshall, of the United States, and of Minister Neal, of England, remained unburied for more than one year after their respective deaths, having been simply stored away in a room at one of the hospitals.

This sad office was performed by Minister Hamilton, upon his arrival here in the beginning of 1868.

On the 22d of this month the police authorities of Quito, going outside of the municipal limits of the city, presumed to force the gate of the Protestant cemetery, although I am the custodian of the key thereof, and to again disinter the body of Mr. Doval, without any notification to myself.

I immediately wrote a strong note to Minister Leon on the subject. He called on me, however, before I had found time to forward it to him, and at his urgent request I finally withheld it, as he promised to stringently rebuke the police authorities, and attributed their act entirely to an ignorance of the whereabouts of the key, and the impression which would be made thereby upon their part.

The chief of police also called upon me and vigorously apologized for the act of his subordinates.

It seems that they found the coffin open, but that the body had its burial-clothes upon it.

I am thoroughly convinced, however, that these were replaced at the second opening of the grave, which was occasioned by the fear of the reward offered by the American citizens, referred to above.

In this opinion I find that all the intelligent foreigners of Quito agree with me.

Great feeling has been occasioned among the foreigners resident in Quito by the outrage.

I must candidly say that the government of Ecuador has shown great desire to detect and punish the criminals, and the President has exhibited a warm personal interest therein.

Colonel Staunton's tombstone, presented by the Smithsonian Institution, Williams College, and Ingham University, has not yet been recovered.

I have not received copies of all the evidence taken in the case, but will forward it so soon as I hold it entire.

Trusting that my action will receive the approval of the Department,
I have, &c.,

RUMSEY WING.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Quito, Ecuador, August 12, 1873.

SIR: On the 16th of last month William C. Doval, an American citizen resident in this country, died in one of the hospitals of this city. On the subsequent day he was buried in the Protestant cemetery. On the succeeding night the gate of the cemetery was forced, the grave of Mr. Doval opened, the clothing torn from his person, and his nude body left upon the ground.

In my absence, the American citizens in Quito offered a reward for the detection of the perpetrators of this foul act of desecration, of the publication of which I inclose a copy.

The body of Mr. Doval was again interred, and a second time was torn from its resting-place.

It is with the most painful sensations that I call the attention of your excellency to the fact that this is the third occurrence of the kind which I have laid before your excellency during my short official residence in this capital.

I am not disposed to believe that these outrages were performed by the common Indians of the country, as general report has it.

I need not assure your excellency of the intense feeling which will not only arise in my own country, but throughout Europe, when a knowledge of these outrages upon the bodies of Protestants deceased in Ecuador becomes public.

I have been informed that certain clues had been placed in the hands of the police of this city, which, if intelligently and honestly followed up, would lead to the conviction of the guilty parties. I cannot learn, however, that any efficient steps have been taken to that end.

Moreover, I desire to add that the tombstone over the grave of Colonel Staunton, one of the most distinguished scientific men of the United States, was stolen from its pedestal upon the night of the second desecration of Mr. Doval's grave.

I respectfully but decidedly request the co-operation of the Ecuadorian government in the detection of the parties implicated in these acts of infamy, and for the future I ask that some steps be taken to prevent a repetition thereof.

With assurances of my very distinguished consideration, I have, &c.,

RUMSEY WING.

FOREIGN OFFICE OF ECUADOR,
Quito, August 19, 1873.

The undersigned, minister for foreign affairs for Ecuador, has had the honor to receive and lay before His Excellency the President of the republic your excellency's esteemed note of date 12th of the present month, in which your excellency informs the undersigned of the outrage that on two occasions has been committed by the disinterment of the body of Mr. W. C. Doval, an American citizen, who died in this city on the 16th of July last, and who was interred in the Protestant cemetery in this city; and also that the marble tombstone on the grave of Colonel Staunton was stolen from its pedestal.

The undersigned, previous to the reception of the indicated note of your excellency, was informed by Mr. Arthur A. Rogers of the particulars of this event, and, in virtue thereof, hastened to give the most stringent orders to the police authorities to inquire into the facts set forth.

In effect, these formalities having been completed, it appeared that no trace whatever existed of the mentioned crime of exhumation except the forcing of the lock of the door.

The undersigned, doubting the exactness of the assertion in this respect, and subsequent to the reception of the dispatch which he has now the honor to answer, ordered anew an examination of the facts, and the direction of the "procès-verbal," an authentic copy of which your excellency will find inclosed.

As this throws no light upon the perpetrators of the grave crime now being investigated, the undersigned hopes that your excellency will be satisfied with the activity and zeal of the government in the elucidation of the affair, which, were it certain, the government would have deplored like your excellency—a scandalous act of profanation, committed in the heart of a republic essentially humane and respectable.

In addition, the undersigned assures your excellency that he has the impression that, up to the present time, no information has reached him of any act of this nature, when all possible means would have been used looking to the punishment of the guilty parties.

With assurances, &c.,

FRANCISCO JAVIER LEON.

Mr. Wing to Señor Leon.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Quito, Ecuador, August 20, 1873.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your excellency's note of yesterday last evening.

I am indebted for the efforts which your excellency's government is making to ascertain the perpetrators of the outrage upon the grave of Mr. Doval.

I am likewise fully persuaded that your excellency's government regards such acts of sacrilege with indignation and regret.

May I request, if any further evidence is taken in the premises, that I be furnished with copies thereof also?

I trust that the search for the culprits will be rigidly prosecuted, and that the beautiful marble tombstone stolen from the grave of Colonel Staunton will be found.

In conclusion, your excellency will pardon me for referring to certain circumstances which will, I am confident, recall to your excellency's memory the fact that your excellency has previously heard of similar outrages.

On reference to the archives of this legation, I find that in the first part of the month of September, 1870, (while I was making preparations for the disinterment of the body of my predecessor, Mr. Coggeshall,) I was informed that previous to my arrival at this capital the grave of Colonel Phineas E. Staunton had been violated, and that his body had been reinterred by certain of the police authorities, and that Mr. Coggeshall's grave had also been opened.

I was in the very act of addressing an official note to your excellency on the subject when your excellency did me the honor to pay me a visit at the office of my legation, in reference to the arrangements for the transmission of Mr. Coggeshall's body to Guayaquil. I then and there verbally made known to your excellency, through the agency of a distinguished gentleman now in Quito, what I had learned in regard to the profanation of the graves of Mr. Coggeshall and Colonel Staunton. Your excellency immediately promised to give stringent orders to the police authorities to do all in their power to ferret out the perpetrators thereof.

I was afterward the recipient of a note from your excellency of date September 10, 1870, in which I was informed that your excellency had hastened to put a knowledge of the outrage before the superintendent of police, in order that he might take the proper steps in relation thereto.

Subsequently, I informed your excellency, that upon the disinterment of the body of Mr. Coggeshall, it was ascertained that his wooden coffin had likewise been broken open, and that a portion of the interior metal coffin had been cut off and taken away, whilst the remains of the coffins, with the body inclosed, had been carelessly thrown back into the grave, without any regard to position whatever.

In this matter I spoke advisedly, as I, in common with the English minister and a number of other foreign gentlemen, was present on the occasion.

Feeling assured that your excellency upon reflection will recall these facts, and regretting that I am compelled to refer to matters so unpleasant of themselves,

I have, &c.,

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of Ecuador, has the honor to address his excellency, the minister resident of the United States of America, with the object of rectifying the idea contained in his communication of the 19th of the present month, as he did not remember at the time that other acts of violation of graves had occurred; but now having inspected the archives of this department, he has seen that in effect your excellency addressed the undersigned, notifying him that an act of this nature had occurred in the grave of Mr. Coggeshall, and that in consequence thereof the government of the undersigned used every measure in its power to discover and punish the culprits, as was communicated to your excellency on September 10, 1873.

Thus rectifying the idea alluded to, I am, &c.,

*Mr. Hamilton to Mr. Wing.*BRITISH LEGATION, QUITO, August 24, 1873.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your note of yesterday, I beg to state that in the interview which took place on the 22d instant between you and Señor Javier Leon, minister for foreign affairs, his excellency frankly admitted that you had personally brought to his knowledge the outrages perpetrated on the graves of Mr. Minister Coggeshall, and Colonel Staunton.

As I was present at the disinterment of the body of Mr. Coggeshall, I remember perfectly well that on arriving at the site of the grave, the ground had every appearance of having been disturbed, and that upon removing the earth which covered the coffin, I observed that the upper outer lid was broken in several places, and that half of the top of the inner zinc coffin had been completely removed and doubtless stolen, as no traces of it were to be found in any part of the grave.

I have, &c.,

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Quito, Ecuador, September 20, 1873. (Received November 4.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward per this mail the report of the minister of the treasury for Ecuador, to the present Congress. It will be found to be interesting in many particulars.

It will be observed that the national income for the past two years exceeds that of the preceding two by nearly $1,000,000.

The domestic debt for manumitted slaves has been liquidated, and only one dividend to North American creditors remains unpaid.

There is an increase of 382,063 pounds (nearly 50 per cent.) in the coffee exports of 1872 over those of 1871 from Guayaquil alone. This is a matter which I have always regarded as of great importance to this country, and to the coffee commerce of the world.

It is pleasant, likewise, to see it officially stated that all of the machinery and articles of general utility purchased by the government are from the United States.

I am aware, also, that another large order has recently gone forward to New York, and that additional American engineers have been and are to be employed by this government.

The small number of American shipping entries in the port of Ecuador, as set forth in the report, will, I trust, be rectified at no very distant day.

Table Z shows the situation of all the light-houses and buoys on the Ecuadorian coast.

There has, of late, been much trouble in regard to the smuggling of silver out of the country, which has prevailed to such an extent as almost to enforce the cessation of specie payments.

It is probable that the salary of the President of the republic will be increased to $20,000 per annum before the close of the present session of Congress.

SIR: Herewith I forward Nos. 1 and 2, copy and translation, of a decree just issued by the President of the republic, whereby those persons accused of political offenses, now expatriated from Ecuador, are granted the privilege of return upon proper application, &c., to the minister of the interior.

I am much gratified to be able to forward this document to the Department, as it betokens a spirit so entirely at variance with that which generally controls the governments of the Spanish American republics.

Gabriel Garcia Moreno, President of the republic of Ecuador, considering—

1st. That by the fourth section of article 60 of the constitution, the power of conceding special pardons is invested in the Executive;

2d. That in the exercise of this faculty the government has pardoned those offenders for political offenses who have solicited it when they were not guilty of grave crimes;

3d. That it is willing to allow the return to the country of all who have left it for purely political reasons and wish to return thereto, and that it does not, nor can it, oppose the return of those fugitives from justice who may come to answer in the courts, and who are in the habit of concealing their ignominious precedents by giving themselves the name of political refugees—

Decrees:

1st. All those who may be without the republic, in consequence of their political action, who desire to return thereto, must send a petition to the minister of the interior, signed by themselves, to obtain a safeguard, which will be conceded them without prejudice to their responsibility for trial for common crime.

The minister of the interior is charged with the execution and carrying out of the present decree.

SIR: I am gratified to ascertain that the removal of all customs dues from American machinery is likely to prove a source of considerable revenue to our countrymen engaged in that line of business, who can now furnish such articles to Ecuadorian purchasers at cheaper rates than their European competitors.

I am already aware of several very large orders that will go forward to New York at an early day; and I have no doubt that these will be largely increased in the course of the coming year, owing to the great demand that is arising in all parts of this country for machinery of all classes.

As I expected, this action on the part of this government has created considerable feeling in certain European quarters.

Quito, Ecuador, November 12, 1873. (Received December 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform the Department that on Monday night last, at 11 o'clock, this city was shaken by a severe earthquake, which, in point of duration and force, surpassed any other since the fearful casualty of 1868. Such abject terror as was displayed by a large portion of the populace was incomprehensible, except as evincing a bitter and bloody experience in the past. Considerable property was destroyed, and it is feared that the beautiful, but already desolated, province of Imbabura has been again subjected to waste and havoc. All the bells in the city rang lustily with the shock.

As I am still very lame from my tedious and painful attack of inflammatory rheumatism, I was unable to leave my bed, though my house rocked like a vessel on a stormy sea, and I never remember to have been more vividly interested in getting into the open air.

I believe, from what I am informed, that by far the greater portion of the inhabitants spent the night in the streets and plazas, many of them with prayers and lamentations.

The movement of an earthquake is certainly a most unpleasant sensation, and as renewed shocks are hourly expected, there may be soon a repetition of the untold horrors of Iberra and Otovalo, so wofully smitten five years ago.

Decree of the Ecuadorian Congress, granting an annual tribute to the Pope.

The senate and deputies of Ecuador in Congress united, considering:

1st. That the Catholic population should contribute to the sustenance of the universal government of the Church;

2d. That this duty is more required at present when our sainted Father finds himself despoiled by iniquitous usurpations of his lands and incomes, and when no Catholic government should fear to comply; and

3d. That the circumstances of the republic permit to give in some manner a solemn testimonial of their adhesion to the sacred seat—

Decree:

ARTICLE 1. Ten per cent. of the part of the church revenues (diezmos) that belongs to the state shall be remitted annually by the Executive to the sainted Father during the embarrassing circumstances with which he is now afflicted, and as an offer of justice, loyalty, and reverence that the Ecuadorian people make to the head of the Church.

ART. 2. The present decree shall be considered in force as from the beginning of the present year.

SIR: Herewith I have pleasure in forwarding a plan of the survey of a high-road from Quito over the Andean crests to the bay of Caragues, on the Pacific coast, made by two young New York engineers, (Messrs. Rogers and Millet.) The road thus far is a great success, and will be supplemented by a railway at an early day. It will open one of the richest and most productive sections of Ecuador to easy traffic, and will soon establish a very important port upon the Pacific seaboard. It will also do away with the long and dangerous journey over Chimbo-razo so soon as it is completed, which will be within a few months.

The railway in process of construction from Milagro to Sibambe, and there connecting with the great highway to Quito, is being vigorously pressed under the direction of Mr. Henry McClellan, of New York, assisted by two young engineers, (Messrs. Curtis and Merrill) of the same State.

The high-road from Quito to Esmeraldas is also under the supervision of Mr. Saltar, of New York.

The material development of Ecuador promises well in the hands of the present progressive and capable President.

All this work has been done since my arrival in this country in June, 1870; and I am gratified that it will stand as a testimonial of educated American skill, science, and persistent energy.

This city has also been greatly improved in all respects within the past three years, and is now, I judge, the cleanest and best paved and watered capital in South America.

Decree of Congress placing Ecuador under the protection of the Sacred Heart.

The senate and house of deputies in Congress united, considering—

1st. That the third provincial council of Quito has, by a special decree, consecrated the republic of Ecuador to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, placing it under its protection;

2d. That it belongs to the legislature to co-operate, in the name of the nation, in an act which, being so in conformity with its sentiments of eminent Catholicism, is also the most efficacious mode of preserving the faith and extending the progress and temporal welfare of the state:

Decree—

ARTICLE 1. The republic of Ecuador is consecrated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and is declared its patron and protector.

ARTICLE 2. The feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus is declared a civic feast, with assistance of the first class, which will be celebrated in all the cathedrals of the republic, by the diocesan prelates, with the greatest solemnity possible.

ART. 3. An altar will be erected in every cathedral dedicated to the Heart of Jesus, so as to excite the zeal and piety of the diocesans.

ART. 4. In the frontispiece of each of the before-mentioned altars a stone will be placed, at governmental cost, in which the present decree will be inscribed.

Let it be communicated to the executive power for its execution and compliance.

SIR: As a matter of general interest, in a maritime point of view, I append an article from the Panama Star and Herald of February 10, in relation to coal and salt mines in Ecuador.

In this connection allow me to add, that Engineer Rogers has just discovered a mine of what is known as "cannel coal", (in the States,) in the road which he is constructing from Quito to the mouth of the river Chones.

COAL AND SALT MINES IN ECUADOR.

The El Facional, of Quito, of the 20th January last, publishes the results of a geognostic exploration of the province of Guayas, by Theodore Wolf, S. J., on account of the government, from which we summarize his remarks on the existence of coal and salt mines in that region of Ecuador.

With respect to coal, which is daily becoming of more and more importance in the Pacific, the report that it had been found near Santa Helena turned out to be premature. On visiting the locality, about three leagues north of Santa Helena, Mr. Wolf found some very narrow strata, which were seen on removing the sand of the sea-coast belonging to the Tertiary formation. They were only about 1½ to 2 inches thick, and consisted of a sort of bituminous lignite, like the similar strata which crop out at the sea-side of Punta Barica, in Colombia. The strata were nearly perpendicular to the surface, and, as there was no chance of their widening or improving in quality below, there was no encouragement to undertake any works to ascertain it, nor did the exploration of any part of the canton of Santa Helena offer any better prospect for good coal. In the narrow tongue of land from Santa Helena to Point Paitilla there were abundant signs of petroleum. The stratum, however, impregnated with this substance is entirely superficial, and belongs to the quarternary formation. In this and the adjacent strata are found the remains of the mastodon. The stratum impregnated with petroleum varies in thickness, averaging one-half a meter. Wells are made to collect the petroleum, from the sides of which it exudes mixed with salt water, the petroleum collecting on the surface of the former. This petroleum is of a dark-green color seen by reflected light, and brown in transmitted light. Exposed to the air, it thickens and gradually takes the form of mineral pitch, (brea mineral), so well known along the coast, and finally becomes hard, like asphaltum. A specimen of petroleum, examined in Quito by the professor of chemistry there, resulted in the opinion that it was well adapted for the manufacture of gas for lighting the streets and for making kerosene. Distillation gives two substances, one liquid and transparent, having the properties of refined petroleum; the other more or less solid, which, on continuing the distillation, yields a better illuminating gas than coal, if used in iron retorts; 100 centimeters, cubic, yields gas as rich as carbon, giving a brilliant light. It evidently consists of ethylene (olefiant gas, C_2H_4) and of acetilene, (C_2H_2). There were contained in the second part of the distillation 59 centimeters, cubic, of petroleum, and 5.925 centimeters, cubic, of lighting gas. There remains, finally, in the retort a small residuum of amorphous carbon. Two meters, cubic, of this gas are equivalent to 15 of coal gas.

It has generally been found that in other countries petroleum is accompanied by common salt, and the same thing exists at Santa Helena. Its altitudes in this region we reserve for a separate article.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the French line of steamers on this coast has just been withdrawn for want of proper support and patronage, and because of its incapacity to cope with the existing English monopoly.

No more auspicious opportunity could well offer for the inauguration of an American steam-line from Panama to Valparaiso, covering, as it would, an ocean track and a commercial traffic which naturally and legitimately pertain to the United States.

In the event of the non-installation of such a line, I have reason to believe that there will soon be a German line on this coast.

The German line from Europe to Aspinwall has already evinced its ability to compete successfully and at remunerative figures with the long-established English steamers.

This is a subject of vast and augmenting interest to American producers, shippers, and importers, and, as such, I respectfully submit it to the consideration of the Department.

SIR: Herewith I have the honor to forward to the Department three clippings from the Panama Star and Herald of July 25 ultimo, bearing upon the important subject of the commerce of the Pacific coast.

No. 1, I am gratified to observe, shows the improved condition of the Pacific Mail-Steamship Company.

No. 2 evinces that the Royal Mail Company between Liverpool and Aspinwall is beginning to compete successfully with the Atlantic connections of the English steam monopoly on this coast.

No. 3 portrays a state of affairs which is somewhat surprising, in view of the previous enormous gains and dividends of the Pacific Steam-Navigation Company; and in my judgment may be attributed in large part to the fact that the recent French line on this seaboard must have interfered more materially with the business of the English steamers than was supposed at the time.

I have, &c.,

RUMSEY WING.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 407.]

President Russell Sage, of Pacific Mail-Steamship Company, says that the company, having succeeded so well, are about to build three new steamers to add to the fleet they already have afloat. These steamers are to be of the finest kind for comfort, speed, and capacity. They will be screw-steamers, 3,000 tons burden, and will cost $600,000 each, or a total of $1,800,000. They will be built on the same model as the City of Peking and other vessels of her class, and are to be finished within twelve months. One vessel will probably be given to John Roach for construction, another to Pusey, Jones & Co., and the third to some other constructor of known capacity. These vessels will be distributed in a manner that will best serve the interests of the company

[Inclosure 2 in No. 407.]

THE NEW CONTRACT OF THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM-PACKET COMPANY.

The new contract of the above company, according to the European Mail of the 17th ultimo, provides that the vessels on the main route are to be of 2,750 tons, and not less than 500 nominal horse-power. The speed not to be less than 11 knots per hour. This is rather a low rate of speed, as $11\frac{1}{2}$ and even 12 knots are practicable. Southampton to Colon, via St. Thomas, is to take 470 hours, and the return 490 hours. In the previous contract, the time was, Southampton to Colon 462 hours, and the return 482 hours. There is, therefore, on the face of it, an increase of eight hours each way in the time occupied by the voyage.

Southampton to Colon, via Barbados, is to take 479 hours, and the return 495 hours.

The company is to have the power of proposing another port in lieu of Southampton for the landing and embarking of the mails. The company is under a penalty for delay, but there is no premium for being within time, as in the previous contract. The postmaster-general takes the power to alter the times of arrival and departure, but no power like that in the old contract to extend the conveyance of mails to any port or place not specified, under which power Plymouth was selected as the landing-place some years ago. The amount of the subsidy has been already stated. The time fixed for the arrival of the mails at Southampton is 10 o'clock on the morning of the 30th, and 11 o'clock on the morning of the 14th. This means late in the afternoon for the delivery of letters in London, and next day for the delivery in all the north of England, as well as in Scotland and Ireland. In short months, as well as in cases when Sunday intervenes, the mails will practically arrive and depart upon the same day. This has been made the subject of strong protests by the West India committee, the West Indian associations of Glasgow and Liverpool, the chambers of commerce of Liverpool, Birmingham, and Manchester, and other bodies. In fact, there has been such a manifestation of opinion as will probably induce the government to retain Plymouth as the landing-place of the mails. It must be added that, by the new inter-colonial arrangements, the time for answering letters in Demerara is very much curtailed.

The tenders for this service were three, viz: Alfred Holt, of Liverpool, £129,000; West India and Pacific Steam-Navigation Company, £120,000; Royal Mail Company, £84,750.

The postmaster-general was endeavoring to get the postage reduced to sixpence.

A memorial to the right honorable the lords commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury "was extensively and influentially signed by merchants, bankers, proprietors, and others interested in the colonies and countries with which correspondence is maintained by means of the West India mail-steamers, begging to express their great regret that no provision is made in the new contract with the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company for continuing the practice of landing the West India mails at Plymouth."

In consequence of this an amended contract was to be laid on the table, providing for calling at Plymouth.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 407.]

THE PACIFIC STEAM-NAVIGATION COMPANY.

An adjourned meeting of the Pacific Steam-Navigation Company was held on the 23d of June, in Liverpool, Mr. Langton, chairman of the board of directors, in the chair. The original meeting was held on the 25th of April last, having been convened in compliance with a requisition from Mr. Robinson, one of the shareholders of the company. The state of affairs then disclosed, and the feeling displayed by the shareholders, led to the appointment of a committee of investigation, with instructions to inquire into and report upon the affairs of the company. The report, which was completed on the 13th June, and published, censures the past management and policy of the company, and to this attributes their recent heavy losses. The committee, in concluding their report, say :

"We have to express our regret that we cannot present a more cheering report. The future, however, is not without promise. The profits of the company have been most seriously affected during the past year in both lines by the high price of coal and its outward freight. This cannot be permanent, and both price and freight are already materially reduced. It may reasonably be expected that the trade on the west coast will revive, and that the tonnage in the Straits line, being more in accord with its requirements, the business will again show a profit. If, then, arrangements can be made to relieve the company of the loss on the laid-up steamers, either by sale or employment, it may be hoped that, under a system of rigid economy and supervision exercised by the board itself, together with a thorough revision of the agencies and the staff at home, afloat, and abroad, this company may yet be restored to the position which it recently occupied as one of the most prosperous steam enterprises of the country."

The purpose of the adjourned meeting was to consider this report, and the attendance of shareholders was large. After a lengthened and somewhat personal discussion the report was adopted. A resolution was also passed appointing a number of shareholders a committee to select such names to be presented to the annual meeting as they may think desirable to fill the vacancies upon the board of management.

SIR: Hereto I append copy and translation (Nos. 1 and 2) of a recent correspondence between the fiscal agent of this government and certain prominent merchants, bankers, and commercial men of Guayaquil, in reference to the late financial crisis in Ecuador, which seriously imperiled the monetary and business interests of the country.

The effect of this correspondence, superadded to the proposed abolition of the executive decree prohibiting the exportation of silver in bars and certain silver coins, has been beneficial.

Exchange has fallen to a decent figure, trade is reviving, confidence being restored, and the Bank of Ecuador has issued a call for the payment in full of its capital stock, and offers to redeem its outstanding notes whenever presented.

The roads (rail and turnpike) are again in course of construction also.

The cost of the ecclesiastic establishments and their accompaniments in Ecuador constitutes a serious and needless drain upon the national revenue, and is out of all proportion to the wealth and resources of the republic.

THE QUESTION OF THE DAY.

We have been requested to publish the following documents, through which will be seen the result of the commission that has brought the under secretary of the treasury, Doctor Salazar, to this city.

Note of Doctor Salazar.

REPUBLIC OF ECUADOR, FISCAL COMMISSION,
Guayaquil, July 20, 1874.

Messrs. Alcides Destruge, José Vivero, and José Rosales :

GENTLEMEN: Desirous of giving a quick and efficacious solution of the matter relative to the loan which was offered to be made to the government, and of the abrogation of the prohibition of the exportation of silver, I believe it expedient to propose to you, as representatives of the merchants of this place :

1st. To deposit in the Bank of Ecuador the sum of $200,000, in discharge of the account known as "loans to the government."

2d. The deposit being made, bonds in favor of the subscribers will be issued at 1 per cent. monthly.

3d. These bonds will be funded, receiving in payment the custom-house receipts, for which 25 per cent. will be set aside.

4th. The loan of $500,000 being accomplished, counting the $300,000 that the bank will take, a free exportation of silver will be declared, preserving solely the right of exportation according to law.

Please, gentlemen, submit this fact to the exchange, and communicate to me the result thereof, so that I may consider my mission terminated.

VICENTE LUCIO SALAZAR.

Answer.

GUAYAQUIL, July 23, 1874.

Vicente Lucio Salazar, esq., Fiscal Agent :

Your communication of the 20th was placed in our hands yesterday, and we informed the merchants who had met, with this object, last evening, in the saloon of the Exchange, of the contents thereof.

Taking into consideration the matter, and unanimously resolved, we are charged to inform you that the signers of the proposal, a copy of which is annexed, and which, on the 5th of this month, we had the honor to inform you of, that they were ready to keep their word under the conditions set forth in that proposal; but aside from that, it is enough, which you deemed it well to present, and the monetary crisis, without exaggeration having made money scarcer every day, the merchants deplore the bad state of the situation that deprives them of the pleasure of accepting in full your proposal, and to improve the occasion to prove to the supreme government their desire to enter into its views and assist it in the measure which it, as well as the merchants, judge really advantageous for all.

But if the efforts of the merchants of Guayaquil, of which you are aware, having been present, have not been sufficient to give to your commission the favorable result which the supreme government and the merchants flattered themselves, permit us to hope from your honor and worth, that when you give an account of your trust, you will manifest the good faith of the merchants in this matter, as also the necessity they have to improve the conditions of the market, which they are mindful of, and decide favorably their petition to the supreme government of the 18th ult.

JOSÉ ROSALES.

JOSÉ VIVERO.

ALCIDES DESTRUGE.

Proposal of the merchants.

The undersigned agree to take the bonds of the government if they are issued at 90 per cent., with 12 per cent. annual interest, redeemable with one-half of the customs-dues; that is, the merchants will pay their customs-dues one-half in bonds, and the other half in current money; but provided, that the government will allow the free exportation of silver, and suspend every privilege in respect to the change of bank-bills, leaving gold and silver money at their legal value and keeping in all force the existing bank-laws.

Paris, August 30, 1873. (Received September 18.)

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 522, in which you express the desire for certain information touching the number of American citizens resident or temporarily sojourning in France, together with the number of children born in this country whose parents claim to be Americans, &c. I will immediately set to work in this matter, and do the best I can, but I fear that at best I can but give you very unsatisfactory information, particularly as to the number of Americans who have been in France from year to year for a series of years back.

There is no place where any record is made of them except at the police, and the registrations there are imperfect, scattered along from day to day among the tens of thousands of other foreigners who enter France. It is therefore practically impossible to get anything satisfactory from the police, and we shall have to rely upon our own knowledge and that of the bankers and house-renters, as well as the newspapers.

The American Register, published in Paris, now gives us weekly quite accurate information as to the arrival of Americans in this city. It has always been my opinion that the number of Americans resident or temporarily sojourning in Paris and in France has been overestimated.

As to the births of children in this country whose parents claim to be Americans, they are never registered at this legation, but at our consulates. I have asked General Read for information on this subject.

It must take a good deal of time to procure even the meager information which I can obtain on this subject.

VERSAILLES, September 8, 1873.

SIR: In the letter which you did me the honor to write me on the 15th July last, you expressed the wish to receive two copies of the last annual report on the manufacture of coin in France.

The minister of the finances, to whom I hastened to apply for these documents, has replied to me that they are not published separately, and that they form part of the general statement of the administration of the finances under the title of "Compte du service des monnaies," comprising, in addition to detailed statements of all the operations of the mints, a recapitulation of the coin struck up to the 31st of December of each year.

However, as the last printed report is that for the year 1870, Mr. Magne has thought it well to send me, in reply to your request, the statement of the coinage of 1871 and 1872.

I have the honor, sir, to transmit them to you herewith.

Receive, sir, &c.,

SIR: Referring to your dispatch No. 522, of August 11, and to my No. 847, of August 30, in reply, I have the honor to inclose you the advertisement of a proposed American Directory, got up by the American Register of this city. This work will give more complete information upon the subject of the number of Americans in France than any that I can obtain from other sources, and I shall forward you a copy so soon as it shall be published, with such remarks as it may seem to call for. In the mean time I have taken steps, by consulting the prominent American bankers here, and other well-informed persons, to inform myself as well as possible upon the subject in question. It results generally from the information I have thus obtained, that the number of resident Americans in France does not increase, but, on the other hand, rather diminishes; that the number of traveling Americans passing through France increases every year, and that there have probably been 20 per cent. more of this class here this year than ever before.

As regards the number of children born in France of American parents, I have reason to believe that they are in most instances registered at the consulates. I have applied to the consul-general for information on this point, as I have already stated, and he has promised to give it to me at the earliest possible date.

In reference to American citizens registered at the "Mairie," with a view to their having the option of being French citizens, I have never heard of an instance of the kind. Children born here of American parents are almost universally registered at the Mairie, because the laws of the country require it, and because it is made the duty of the attendant physician to see that it is done. Such children, I have reason to believe, do sometimes, on coming of age, select ("opter") to become French citizens; but I know of but one such instance, and I am sure that they are extremely rare.

In reference to your fourth inquiry, I doubt if any American citizen has formally disowned American citizenship; at least no such case has ever come to my knowledge, and the laws requiring military service in France are so onerous that I doubt if any one who is free from their operation voluntarily submits himself to them.

I shall have the honor to refer to this subject again when I shall have received a copy of the American Directory referred to.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

Will be published shortly, the American Directory for Paris and Europe.

In addition to the names and addresses of all Americans permanently residing in Paris and the different cities in Europe, the above work will contain many valuable documents and much useful information upon all subjects of interest to Americans residing or traveling on the continent. Americans residing in remote parts of Europe are kindly requested to send their names and addresses to the offices of the American Register, 2 Rue Scribe, Paris; or 4 Langham Place, London, for insertion in the above.

SIR: The letter of the Count de Chambord to Mr. Chesnelon, which appeared in the Union, the ultra Catholic organ in this city, last night, was like a clap of thunder in a clear sky. I send you herewith a translation of it as it appears in the Galignani this morning.

[Inclosure in No. 875.]

Letter from the Count de Chambord.

PARIS. October 31, 1873.

The Union, legitimist organ, publishes the following communication addressed by the prince to Mr. Chesnelon, deputy of the Basses-Pyrénées:

SALZBURG, October 27, 1873.

"I have guarded, monsieur, so agreeable a reminiscence of your visit to this place, and I have conceived for your character so deep an esteem, that I do not hesitate to reply to you frankly as you yourself came so loyally to me.

"You spoke to me during long hours of the destinies of our beloved country, and I know that, on your return, you employed, in the midst of your colleagues, language which claims my eternal gratitude. I thank you to have so well understood the anguish of my mind, and not to have made any concealment of the unalterable fixity of my resolution.

"And so I did not allow myself to be disturbed when public opinion, carried away by a current which I deplore, pretended that I consented at last to become the legitimate king of the revolution. I had for guarantee the testimony of a man of honor, and I was resolved to keep silence as long as I should not be forced to make an appeal to your loyalty.

"But since, in spite of your efforts, misunderstandings are accumulating, and endeavoring to obscure my policy, which is open as the day, I owe the whole truth to the country, by which I may be misconstrued, but which pays homage to my sincerity, because it knows that I never have deceived it, and never will.

"I am asked at present for the sacrifice of my honor. What can I reply, except that I retract nothing—that I retrench nothing whatever from my preceding declarations? The pretensions of yesterday give me the measure of the exigencies of the morrow, and I cannot consent to inaugurate a reign, reparatory and strong, by an act of weakness.

"It is the fashion, you are aware, to oppose to the firmness of Henri V the cleverness of Henri IV. 'The violent love I bear to my subjects,' said that monarch often, 'renders everything possible and honorable for me.'

"I pretend, on this point, not to yield to him in anything; but I should be glad to know what lesson any imprudent man would have drawn on himself who should have dared to recommend him to repudiate the standard of Arques and Ivry.

"You belong, monsieur, to the province which saw him born, and you will be, like myself, of opinion that he would soon have disarmed his interlocutor, in saying to him, with his Bearnese dash: 'Friend, take my white flag; it will always guide you on the road to honor and victory.'

"I am accused of not holding in sufficiently high esteem the valor of our soldiers, and that at a moment when I only aspire to confide to them everything that I hold most dear. People forget that honor is the common patrimony of the house of Bourbon and of the French army, and that on that ground they cannot fail to agree.

"No; I do not disregard any one of the glories of my country; and God only, in the depth of my exile, has seen my tears of gratitude flow every time that, either in good or evil fortune, the sons of France have shown themselves worthy of her.

"But we have a great work to accomplish together. I am ready, perfectly ready, to undertake it, when called on to do so, to-morrow, this evening, or this moment. That is why I wish to remain entirely what I am; for, if lessened to-day, I should be powerless to-morrow.

"The business in hand is nothing less than to reconstitute on its natural basis a society profoundly disturbed, to insure with energy the reign of the law, to restore prosperity at home, to contract durable alliances abroad, and, above all, not to fear to employ force in the service of order and justice.

"Conditions are spoken of; but were any laid down by the young prince, whose loyal embrace I felt with so much joy, and who, listening only to his patriotism, came spontaneously to me, bringing to me, in the name of all his friends, assurances of peace, devotedness, and reconciliation?

"Guarantees also are required; but were any asked for from that Bayard of modern times, in that memorable night of May 24, when the government imposed on his modesty the glorious mission of calming his country by one of those phrases of an honest man and soldier, which re-assure the good and make the wicked tremble?

"I have not, it is true, like him, borne the sword of France in twenty battle-fields, but I have preserved intact, for forty-three years, the sacred deposit of our traditions and our liberties. I have a right, therefore, to reckon on the same confidence, and I ought to inspire the same security.

"My person is nothing; my principle, everything. France will see the end of her trials when she shall be willing to comprehend that truth. I am the necessary pilot, the only man capable of steering the ship into port, because I have mission and authority to do so.

"You, monsieur, can do much toward dissipating misunderstandings and terminating weaknesses in the hour of the struggle. Your consolatory words in leaving Salzburg are unceasingly present to my thought. France cannot perish, for Christ still loves his French; and when God has resolved to save a people, he takes care that the scepter of justice shall not be placed in any hands but those that are firm enough to uphold it.

"HENRI."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, November 9, 1873. (Received November 26.)

SIR: I closed my No. 879 at noon on the 7th instant, in which I gave an account of the action of the Assembly on the proposition of Changarnier. It was then everywhere believed that the government would have matters all its own way, and that the "commission" to which the proposition was to be sent would consider it favorably and report it back immediately with a recommendation that it should pass. It would be well to explain a little touching the constitution of this "commission," or, as we should call it in congressional practice and parlance, a "special committee." It is not appointed by the president of the Assembly, but is elected by the different "bureaux," as they are called, of the body. There are fifteen of these bureaux, consisting of fifty members each, and they are drawn as we draw jurymen in our country. When the bureaux were drawn on the second day of the Assembly, it was claimed that the fusionists or government party were in a majority in nine out of the fifteen. Each of these fifteen bureaux had to elect, by ballot, one member of the commission to be charged with the examination of the Changarnier proposition.

It seems everywhere to have been taken for granted that the commission to be thus elected would have a majority in favor of the proposition, pure and simple. It was on Friday last that this commission was to be elected by the bureaux. Each bureau held its meeting, presided over by its president, and regular discussions were had in all of them, in which the ablest members of the Assembly participated. When the vote was taken, it appeared to the astonishment of everybody and to the utter discomfiture of the government that the "fusionists" had elected only seven members, while the opposition had elected five. In three bureaux, where the opposition had sure majorities, they adjourned the election till the following day, yesterday, in order that they might remain to some extent masters of the situation, and prevent any possibility of a snap judgment. These three elections were accordingly held yesterday, and the Count de Reimdal, Señor Jay, and Laboulazé, three strong men of the opposition, were elected, thus making a majority of one in the commission against the government. This sudden and unlooked-for check of the fusionists was a complete surprise, and created profound astonishment in all parties.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch, No. 758, of January 31, I have the honor to renew the suggestion therein made, that you should call the attention of naturalized citizens, born in France, to the inconvenience, expense, and trouble they are put to in returning to the place of their birth.

The French laws are well defined upon the subject, and I have no fault to find with the manner in which they are applied. When it is proved before a civil court that the party "has lost his quality of French citizen" he cannot serve in the French army; and when it is shown that he has lost this quality for over three years he cannot be punished for insoumission; but pending the trial and decision of the court the party may be imprisoned. This is not always done. He is often released on bail. But under all circumstances he must employ counsel, and is put, as I have said, to great inconvenience and expense. These cases are of almost monthly occurrence.

If the attention of our citizens of this class was called yearly to the French laws upon this subject, and they were cautioned against returning to France, it might save them this expense and inconvenience.

But such has not been the case. The committee has not reported at the present writing, and the discussion on the interpellation has been postponed. Therefore, I have nothing to write about so far as the Assembly is concerned; and as to the committee of fifteen, it has been holding daily sessions all the week. I shall have to give you the result of its labors in a later dispatch. On all substantial propositions it has stood seven for the government and eight opposition. The report may be made to-day or to-morrow, and the Assembly will probably settle the question next week.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 9, 1874. (Received January 22.)

SIR: The National Assembly reconvened yesterday after a recess of a few days for the holidays, and all Paris is surprised this morning to find that there was a modified form of a ministerial crisis at Versailles last night, and of which the press dispatches have advised you before this time. It seems that the government, confident of its strength, had determined to put through, under whip and spur, its project of law relative to the nomination of mayors and to the attributions of the municipal police. When the question came up, to the surprise of almost every one, the Marquis de Franchen, an old legitimist and a member of the extreme right, moved to adjourn the discussion until the question of the organic law for municipalities should come up regularly for consideration, as reported from the commission of thirty. This motion was in the nature of a notice by the extreme right, served on the government, that it was not satisfied with its action, and of which a good deal has heretofore been said in the newspapers. The proposition for a postponement was treated with disdain by the Duke de Broglie and by Mr. Clapier, the reporter of the commission on the law. After two votes by rising and sitting the result was declared to be doubtful, and the appel nominal was demanded and carried; when that is ordered by the Assembly, each member is called by name, who advances to the tribune and deposits his vote. By this time the ministry had become alarmed, as they had discovered that many members of the extreme right were in favor of the postponement of the discussion. The house was thin, and a great many supporters of the government were absent. Then commenced a great struggle to put off the question until to-day, when the absentees could be got in, but that could not be done under the rules of the Assembly. So the vote went in, and it resulted in two hundred and sixty-eight for the motion of the Marquis de Franchen and two hundred and twenty-six against; the government being beaten by forty-two votes. The result was an overwhelming surprise to the ministry, and put them emphatically in a "tight place." There was nothing else to be done, and so last night they all marched up to the presidency and placed their resignations in the hands of the President, who declined to accept them, and asked his ministers to hold their respective places until he should make a decision in the matter. The news came from Versailles to-day that the President will not take any decision in the offer of resignations until there shall be a vote of confidence taken in the Assembly, and the result of which will be known to you about as soon as I shall know it. If a vote of confidence shall be taken, my own opinion is that the ministers will be indorsed.

SIR: In my No. 918 in relation to the late ministerial crisis, I foreshadowed what has actually taken place since in regard to a vote of confidence. The vote adverse to the ministry took place on Thursday, the 8th instant. The next day the Assembly adjourned over until Monday, and then the government went to work to bring all its force together on that day for a new trial. There was a good deal of excitement, and I went out to Versailles to attend the sitting. The chamber was very full, and it was evident from the beginning that the government was in the majority. After a few speeches * * * a test vote was had, and the ministry was indorsed by fifty-eight majority. The next day the ministers withdrew their resignations, and all is now quiet on the banks of the Seine. The Assembly is discussing the "mayor's bill," as it is called, and it will be voted in exact accordance with the views of the government on to-day or to-morrow.

The first grand presidential ball of the season was given at the palace of the Elysée, in Paris, on Wednesday night last. Seven thousand invitations were given out, and the crowd was enormous.

SIR: Referring to your dispatch of January 14, No. 579, in reference to the case of Mr. Ernest Marx, an American citizen arrested in France as owing military service to the French government, I have the honor to inform you that Mr. Marx called at this legation about January 1.

* See correspondence from Denmark, Germany, and Russia.

† See correspondence from Germany and Denmark.

Mr. Hoffman explained to him the law upon the subject and advised him not to return to the "arrondissement" where he was inscribed as owing military service, as he would inevitably be arrested; and although he would be finally released as an American citizen of more than three years' standing, he would be subjected to much inconvenience, annoyance, and expense. Mr. Marx called again in a few days, when I saw him, and repeated the advice given by Mr. Hoffman. He saw fit, however, to disregard it, and returned to Remiremont. On receipt of your dispatch of January 14th on the 27th, I wrote to Mr. Marx to inquire what was his position, and to offer to him any service in my power. He answered on the 29th, that they had made him very miserable at Remiremont since his return from Paris, and that his lawyer would write me full particulars in a few days. I have heard nothing from his lawyer, from which I conclude that the matter has taken its usual course, that Mr. Marx has established to the satisfaction of a civil court that he is an American citizen, and so cannot serve in the French army, and that he has been an American citizen for a period of three years, and so that his "délit" of "insoumission" is covered by prescription. If he has succeeded in showing this he has no doubt been discharged, his position in this case is established, and he will have no more embarrassment from the French military authorities.

I need scarcely add that, should I hear that he is still in trouble, I shall do what I can to assist him.

SIR: I have the honor respectfully to ask instructions in the following case:

An American lady, native born, after arriving at womanhood, came to Europe and married an Englishman. After living many years with her husband and having children by him, she has recently obtained a divorce in England. She now applies to me for a passport, to be issued in her maiden name and as an American citizen. I have declined giving such a passport for the reasons—

First. That there is nothing in the decree of divorce authorizing her to take her maiden name; and that I am not advised that the laws of England, independent of the order in the decree, authorize a divorced woman, at her option, to take her maiden name. Second. Touching the question of citizenship, I consider her case analogous to that decided by you in your dispatch No. 238, dated February 24, 1871, where you decided that it would be judicious to withhold a passport in a case where an American woman had married a foreigner, and her husband had afterward died, unless she gave evidence of her intention to resume her residence in the United States.

In the present case the party desiring the passport not only does not "give evidence of her intention to resume her residence in the United States," but avows that her purpose in obtaining a passport in her maiden name is to enable her to marry a Frenchman.

I have been pressed to give this passport with so much insistence that I had to promise to submit the question to you for your decision. I might add that it is strongly contended, by the parties interested, that this case is different from the case referred to in your dispatch No. 238, and that the decree of divorce dissolves the nationality of the woman as well as the bonds of matrimony. I, however, do not take this view of the subject. I might add further, that this lady, who is, in my opinion, an English subject to all intents and purposes, now holds passports which were issued to her before her divorce, by two American ministers in Europe.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, May 8, 1874. (Received May 22.)

SIR: The National Assembly will reconvene on Tuesday next, the 12th instant. That event is looked forward to with great interest by the political world. During the recess there has been comparative quiet in the country, and matters have moved along quite smoothly. Two members have committed suicide: Mr. Bealé, who was the first minister of the interior under President MacMahon; and a member from the Alps Maritimes, who blew out his brains a few days ago.

From the givings-out of the semi-official organs of the Government in Paris, it has now become well understood that among the first things to be done after the Chamber meets, will be the presentation of the constitutional laws by the Duke de Broglie. Such being the case, the extreme right are taking an attitude more and more hostile toward the Government. The right considers the Septennat simply as a "régime neutre," a mere temporary affair, which must cease when it shall be deemed that the time has come to proclaim royalty. Finding that the cabinet is endeavoring to consolidate this MacMahon government by constitutional laws, the legitimists have commenced an active campaign in a contrary sense. The last and most significant thing they have done, was to hold at Tours a convention of the editors of the legitimate Catholic press. Sixty-five newspapers were represented at this congress. Forty of them have put out a manifesto against the Septennat and against the projected constitutional laws, and also making an appeal to the chamber to re-establish the monarchy and recall the "King." The Union, which is the organ par excellence of the legitimists, declares formally to the cabinet that the presentation of the constitutional laws would be considered by the right as "an act of hostility." There are further rumors of a coup d'état on the part of the Count de Chambord; on dit, that the "King," as the ultra-monarchists now call him, will come into Versailles on the 12th instant, and place himself at the disposition of the chamber, if the "good of the country" shall demand it. The more sensible of the legitimists see great risk in such action in the present state of feeling in the country, but such is the excited state of feeling among a certain class of monarchists that the most senseless projects find adherents.

Two things appear certain, however: first, that the government will present to the Assembly what they call the constitutional laws, that is to say, the law electoral and the project for the two chambers. The extreme right will vote against them, and should the government be defeated, there must of course be a modification of the present ministry.

MR. MINISTER: I have the honor to inform your excellency that it appears from a letter addressed by his highness Prince Gortchacow to his excellency Prince Orloff, and dated Saint Petersburg, April 6, [18,] 1874, that His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias has deigned favorably to receive the suggestions presented by the society for the amelioration of the condition of prisoners of war with the greater satisfaction, inasmuch as they harmonize with a humane thought which has long been entertained by His Imperial Majesty, and as, at the very time when this project reached the imperial cabinet, His Majesty had already given orders for the examination of a similar project, conceived in the same spirit, but on a more general plan.

The examination of this project having been concluded, and the imperial cabinet having just proposed to all the European cabinets to send delegates to a convention which is to meet at Brussels on the 15th [27th] of July, 1874, said delegates to be invested with full powers to discuss the principles and elaborate the details of an international agreement, embracing all the matters inherent to a state of war, the preparatory conference, which was to meet at Paris on the 18th instant, is rendered unnecessary, since its principal purpose was to induce some government to take the initiative, which has now been taken by the imperial cabinet of Russia. The project emanating from the imperial cabinet, and that which I have had the honor to communicate to your excellency in the name of the society whose president I am, will be laid before the conference at Brussels simultaneously for examination, and will serve as the basis of a general arrangement, which, if unanimously adopted by all civilized nations, would result in diminishing, as far as this is possible, the calamities of international conflicts, by precisely defining the rights of governments and armies in time of war.

As the result of an interview which I have had the honor to have with Prince Gortchacow at Stuttgart, the society for the amelioration of the condition of prisoners of war has been authorized by the imperial cabinet to beg your excellency to be pleased to inform your Government that, if it shall see fit to take part in the Brussels conference, and will notify the imperial cabinet to that effect, its delegates will be most gladly received there.

I have the honor to beg you, Mr. Minister, to be pleased to communicate the contents of this letter to your Government, and I avail myself of this occasion to thank your excellency for the favor which you have been pleased to show us.

I have the honor to be, Mr. Minister, with respect, your excellency's very humble and very obedient servant,

COUNT DE HOUDETOT,
President of the executive committee, for the society and by authority.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, May 19, 1874. (Received June 4.)

SIR: "Le ministère est tombé." Such were the words that passed rapidly from mouth to mouth in Paris early on Saturday evening last, creating not a little astonishment and surprise.

The National Assembly had reconvened on Tuesday, the 12th instant. The matters that were to come immediately before it for discussion and action excited great interest throughout France. Nothing of public importance was done the first few days. On Friday the Duke de Broglie presented his great scheme for a second chamber, under the name of "Grand Conseil."

* * * * *

The first real business that was to come on was the discussion of the constitutional laws. No immediate crisis was anticipated. On Saturday last the Assembly met as usual at 2 o'clock. The chamber was very full, there being more than seven hundred members present, but there was no particular excitement. Mr. Buffet rings his bell, and the members slowly crowd themselves into their narrow seats. One of the secretaries reads the journal of the previous day. After some unimportant business Mr. Batbie, the president of the commission on constitutional laws, slowly mounts the tribune, and, in the name of his commission, moves that the first reading of the electoral law should be made the order of the day for the following Wednesday. Upon this Mr. Thiry, a member of the extreme right, proposed to amend the proposition, by providing that the project for municipal laws should be made the order of the day for the same day, but that it should have priority in discussion. All this seemed to be a very simple matter, and one could hardly have supposed that a question of cabinet would come out of it.

Messrs. Raudat and Lucien F. Brun, members of the extreme right, did not oppose any objection to the setting down of the electoral law at the time named, but thought it more important to dispose of the municipal law first; but neither of these saw in this mere question of priority anything which was of any gravity, or which would necessarily bring about a division. Not so with the Duke de Broglie, the vice-president of the council and head of the ministry. Assured of his strength in the Assembly, and anxious for a vote of confidence, which he was certain the Assembly would give to his ministry, in a short and emphatic speech he placed the government in antagonism to the proposition of Mr. Thiry, giving priority to the discussion of the municipal law. In language not to be misunderstood, he made the proposition "une question de cabinet." It was at that moment that the Assembly awoke to the supreme importance of the matter before them, and, in the language of the official report of the proceedings, a "mouvement prolongé" followed. The Assembly then proceeded to a vote upon the priority of the electoral law. At twenty minutes after 3 o'clock the president declared the result. Out of 698 voices, 317 voted in favor of the government proposition for giving priority to the electoral law, and 381 voted against it. It was amid profound agitation that this announcement, which was the death-knell of the ministry, was heard, it being hardly possible to believe that such a stupendous result could have been accomplished so suddenly and unexpectedly.

The Duke Decazes, minister of foreign affairs, was not so stunned by the blow that he could make no sign, but, on the other hand, promptly mounted the tribune, and presented a law ratifying the postal treaty between France and the United States. This proposition was received with cries of "Très bien, très bien." As soon as the minister of foreign affairs had descended the tribune the Duke de Broglie left the government benches, followed by all his colleagues who had been present at the sitting. They proceeded at once to the palace of the prefecture, to place their resignation in the hands of the President of the republic. Their resignations were accepted, but with the request that they should retain their portfolios until a new ministry should be named. Thus fell the ministry of the 20th of November, 1873, and which was a continuation, with but little change, of the ministry of the 25th of May preceding, and which came into power upon the downfall of Mr. Thiers and the accession of Marshal MacMahon to the office. It may in fact all be called one ministry, as the Duke de Broglie was the leading spirit in both. Mr. Thiers was overthrown on the 24th of May, 1873, eight days less than a year ago. As Mr. Thiers was shown the door of the Assembly on that occasion, he quietly said to one of the men who headed the movement against him, "You are in for a year;" and the present result shows how nearly correct he was. The expulsion of Mr. Thiers from power was only accomplished after a prodigious struggle, and by a most skillful grouping together of all the elements of opposition to his administration of the government. The majority by which he was upset, and which resulted in a complete change of the policy and "personnel" of the government, was only fourteen votes. The change once made, however, many members who had voted to sustain Mr. Thiers rallied round the MacMahon government, which has in all matters, where a vote would affect the ministry, had a reliable and compact majority of from sixty to a hundred votes, and this too in the face of a powerful, resolute, and apparently increasing feeling of hostility in the country toward the MacMahon rule. Though this present government, styled by the opposition the "government of combat," has been constantly attacked by the radical press; and though a feeling of intense hostility has been gradually developing against it in the ranks of the extreme right and among the Bonapartists, yet when the pinch has come in the Assembly, by dint of heated appeals to save the country from what they call "the horrors of radicalism," a sufficient number of votes has always been obtained to save the ministry from overthrow. When in a recent dispatch, in speaking of the state of things likely to arise when the constitutional laws should come to be discussed, I expressed the opinion that the ministry would be sustained over all opposition, I but spoke the sentiment of the most intelligent men with whom I had conversed on the subject.

SIR: Referring to your No. 963, of the 5th of May, relating to the case of an American woman married to a British subject and divorced, and by whom an application was made to you for a passport as a citizen of the United States, I have to state that the course pursued by you in regard thereto is approved.

On reference to my No. 238, in relation to the conditions upon which passports are granted to aliens, it appears to render further instructions on the subject unnecessary.

It is proper, however, to say, by way of explanation of those instructions, that it is not intended to be inferred that when a woman, a citizen of the United States, marries an alien who resides out of the jurisdiction of the United States, she absolutely ceases to be a citizen thereof, and becomes subject to all the disabilities of alienage. The instruction must, of course, be assumed to refer only to subjects within the cognizance of this Department.

SIR: The reactionists in the Assembly met with a serious check on Wednesday. The committee on constitutional laws had reported a provision fixing the age of twenty-five years for voters in municipal elections. If this proposition had been adopted by the Assembly, the same limit would have been applied to voters at all elections. Hence its great importance. When the question came up for discussion, Mr. Oscar de Lafayette, the grandson of General Lafayette, moved an amendment fixing the age at twenty-one years, and to the surprise, I think, of almost every one, this amendment was carried by a majority of thirteen votes. Most of the Bonapartists voted for the amendment, but Mr. Magne, the Bonapartist minister of the finances, voted against it. This vote gives hopes that the friends of universal suffrage have a majority even in this Assembly. It was remarked that the Prince de Joinville separated himself from his Orleanist friends, and voted for the amendment of Mr. de Lafayette.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: * * * * *

The political event of the week has been the action of the National Assembly upon a proposition of the left center brought forward by Mr. Casimir Perier, the object of which was practically to have the Assembly declare the definitive establishment of the republic with two chambers and a president, chief of the executive power. It was known on Saturday last that Mr. Casimir Perier was to bring forward this proposition in the Assembly on Monday, and demand what is called "urgency" by the rules of that body. A matter of this importance naturally excited a great deal of interest, particularly as the uncertainty was so great as to what action the Assembly would take in the premises. As the day was likely to be an interesting one, I went to Versailles. Nearly all the deputies were present, and the galleries were crowded with spectators.

Mr. Casimir Perier introduced his proposition, and after an exciting discussion of two or three hours a vote was taken, which resulted in the adoption of "urgency" by a majority of four votes out of a vote of six hundred and eighty-six. The result was unexpected by the monarchist coalition, and its announcement created surprise and stupor.

All the ministers voted against this proposition of urgency, and, of course, found themselves in the minority. * * * * *

Although this vote on urgency was, to a great extent, a test vote, and the republican papers have crowed over it very lustily, yet it is by no means conclusive. Under the rules of the Assembly, if urgency had not been voted, the proposition would have been consigned to a committee which is the general receptacle of all such projects, and where it would have never been heard of again. But urgency being voted, it went to the committee on constitutional laws, and that committee is obliged to consider it and report it back to the house. When reported back the regular readings are dispensed with, and the Assembly is obliged to act upon it to the exclusion of all other business. The committee to which the proposition has gone is undoubtedly opposed to it, and will make an adverse report. Then the Assembly will have to pass on it de novo, and the question is, can it pass in face of all the influences of the administration and of the legitimist and imperialist parties against it? The inclination of my opinion is that it will be finally rejected; but there is too much uncertainty in the matter to make any predictions. Its adoption will make another and quite a radical change in the government, for it involves a new ministry, to be taken from the various republican groups, and from the lightest shades of the right center, some members of which are inclined to accept the republic out of their mortal fear of the empire.

After the Assembly had finished with this business, a strange and unlooked-for event happened. The Duke de Larochefoucauld Bisaccia, French ambassador at the court of St. James, London, rose and made the following motion :

ARTICLE I. The government of France is a monarchy, having at its head the chief of the house of France.

ART. II. Marshal MacMahon is appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom.

ART. III. The monarchical institutions shall be regulated by the nation and the king.

This was like a clap of thunder in midwinter. That a man holding so high an office under the government of the republic should deliberately make a proposition to change the form of the government he served, created profound surprise, and that surprise was intensified when it was found that nearly half of the Assembly rose promptly to second him, including even the Bonapartists. And, indeed, it was an extraordinary spectacle to see nearly all the men who had voted the septennate, and sworn that they would stand by MacMahon through fire and blood for seven years, turning deliberately round, and declaring France to be a monarchy, "having at its head the chief of the house of France." Even half of the ministers of Marshal MacMahon voted for this proposition. It was, however, lost by a rising and standing vote, by about sixty majority, as near as could be estimated. The whole thing, therefore, turned out to be a "fiasco," and its effect has been to weaken the anti-republican coalition very materially. Consequently, the Duke de Larochefoucauld Bisaccia has been very roundly abused for bringing forward his proposition at that time. All the Paris journals say that he sent in his resignation immediately after the adjournment of the Assembly, and that it was promptly accepted; but the official journal makes no mention of the fact. It is quite evident, however, that he will have to go, for after having taken the step he has in the Assembly, in the face of France and of Europe, it will be hardly possible for him to hold on; and this is rather a pity, for I believe that he has made a very popular and acceptable ambassador at London. It was observed that the Duke Decazes, minister of foreign affairs, voted against the proposition of his London ambassador, and hence it appears probable that the resignation of the Duke of Bisaccia will be accepted if offered.

SIR: The joint commission organized in Washington by the Spanish and American Governments, pursuant to the agreement of February 12, 1871, for the settlement of claims against Spain growing out of the insurrection in Cuba, soon after its organization selected Baron Lederer, the honored representative of the Austrian Empire at Washington, as the umpire, pursuant to the first article of the agreement. Baron Lederer has lately been recalled by his government, and has, in consequence, resigned such appointment; and the selection of another umpire becomes necessary. Under the first article of the agreement above referred to, the selection of the umpire is the duty of the commission, and this Department is informed, by a communication from the arbitrator of the United States, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, that the commission, at their session on the 11th of July, selected his excellency Mr. Bartholdi, the minister of France to this country, as umpire, in the place of Baron Lederer, who had resigned, and that Mr. Bartholdi had been officially notified of his appointment, but withholds his reply until his government shall have authorized the acceptance of the appointment.

The President has learned with great satisfaction of the selection of the accomplished and experienced French minister as umpire, and you will express this satisfaction to the French government, with the hope that permission may be given Mr. Bartholdi to act in such capacity.

You will further signify that the proceedings of the commission are suspended pending this appointment, and that it is desirable that this permission be given at an early day.

SIR: Some time since I learned, through Mr. George Bemis, who was coming from Italy into France, that the police at the frontier were in the habit of demanding passports from Americans, while Englishmen were permitted to pass without any demand for their passports. I at once addressed a letter to the Duke Decazes, calling his attention to this fact, and particularly to the fact that passports were required of Americans and not of Englishmen. Before writing to the duke I had spoken to him on the subject, and he expressed his surprise at the existence of such a state of things, and promised that it should at once be remedied. He intervened promptly with the minister of the interior, and the result was a notice in the "Journal Officiel," a copy of which I inclose herewith.

I also send a notice from the "Journal Officiel," in regard to the emigration which has taken place to the United States from France. I would like to be advised, for my own information, whether there is any truth in the reports thus put forth by the French government, that there is dissatisfaction among the French emigrants in Philadelphia or elsewhere in the United States.

MINISTRY OF THE INTERIOR.

Since the 4th July last the formality of passports has been dispensed with between France and the United States of America; consequently American citizens are free to enter French territory and travel thereon on the simple declaration of their name and their nationality, and with this reservation, also imposed upon other countries, that the traveler shall be able to furnish, upon every requisition of the agents of French police, the proof, by whatever title, of their identity and their nationality.

On several occasions agricultural laborers and others have been warned not to make engagements as emigrants without having previously given information to the administration at Paris, Havre, Belfort, Bordeaux, Marseilles, at the commissioners specially charged with superintendence of immigration and in the departments of the prefecture and sous-prefectures.

It seems expedient to renew these recommendations in view of the numerous demands of repatriation (repatriement) at the expense of the state, addressed to several of our agents abroad, especially at Philadelphia, (United States,) where many French, particularly Alsatians and natives of Lorraine, having chosen French nationality, have been far from reaping the advantages which the emigrant-recruiting officers had caused them to hope.

SIR: Though in my No. 996, of the 13th instant, I spoke of the constant recurring changes in the ministry, I must confess I did not expect another crisis quite so soon, but it so falls out that since that dispatch there have been two important changes. Mr. Magne, the minister of finance, having been overwhelmingly beaten on a vital question in the Assembly, was obliged to give in his resignation on the 16th instant, which was promptly accepted by the President. Though regarded as an able man and a good minister of finance, he had "lost his grip" on the Assembly more really by his pronounced Bonapartism than by failure in his position. His resignation, however, did not cause so much excitement as that of Mr. Fourtou, the minister of the interior, which took place two days afterward. This resignation was not expected, and, as it was due wholly to political reasons, it has occasioned a great deal of talk. It is now known that there were serious dissensions in the ministry, and that Mr. Fourtou insisted upon a certain course of policy which was squarely opposed by the Duke Decazes, and rejected by the other ministers. Thereupon Fourtou resigned, very much to the regret of the President. It is alleged that Fourtou was a Bonapartist in disguise, and that he had insisted that the successor of Mr. Magne should be a Bonapartist, and that the investigations which had been instituted in regard to Rouher and other Bonapartists should be stopped, and that Leon Reinault, the prefect of police, who had charge of them, should be removed. He also took grounds in relation to the septennate which were not satisfactory to the rest of the ministers.

These two ministers have been replaced; Mathieu Bodet goes into the ministry of finance, and General Chabaud Latour replaces Mr. Fourtou. I send herewith very brief biographical sketches of the two gentlemen. The selections, in my judgment, are very fortunate. Mathieu Bodet is a lawyer of ability, who has made finance very much of a study. He is not put down as belonging to any of the various groups in the Assembly, but is regarded as fluctuating between the right center and the left center, what we would call in the West a "floater." General Chabaud Latour appertains to the right center and is regarded as a very honest and capable man, and has always been a devoted friend of the Orleans family. He is a Protestant in religion, and has selected for his under secretary Cornelius DeWitt, the son-in-law of Guizot, and also a Protestant. Both of the new ministers are members of the Assembly.

Yesterday the Assembly discussed the proposition of Casimir Perier to definitively found the republic. This proposition, after a discussion of several hours, was rejected by a majority of forty-one. It was uncertain at one time how far the government would go in opposing this proposition, but at the pinch General de Cissey, the vice-president of the council, came out flat-footed in opposition to it and called for its rejection. This action of the government settled the business. After this vote was taken a proposition was presented for the dissolution of the Assembly, which was rejected by twenty-nine majority. To-day it is supposed that the discussion will commence on the report of Mr. Ventavon on the counter-proposition of the committee of thirty. It is believed that this proposition will also be rejected, and everything in the Assembly will be at sea.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURN.

[Inclosure, (newspaper extract.)—Translation.]

It will not be uninteresting to examine the political record of the two new ministers whose appointments were announced yesterday in the "Journal Officiel."

General Chabaud Latour was born at Nîmes, January 25, 1804. He entered the polytechnic school in 1820, graduated with high honors, entered the corps of military engineers, took part in the expedition against Algiers, afterward worked on the fortifications of Paris, and from 1832 to 1843 was an orderly officer under the Duke of Orleans. In 1837, the Vigan district chose him as its representative in the Chamber of Deputies, where he took his seat in the right center, and remained until the last day, that is, until 1848, (he having been kept in office for eleven years,) one of the most devoted supporters of the Orleans family. The February revolution surprised him, still full of confidence in the political wisdom of M. Guizot, for whom he had obstinately voted under all circumstances.

M. de Chabaud Latour seems to have kept aloof from politics under the empire. King Louis Philippe made him a colonel in 1845, the Emperor Napoleon III appointed him brigadier-general in 1853, and assigned to him the chief command of the engineer corps in Algeria. The war of 1870 found him inscribed among the reserves, with the title of general of division, which he had held since 1857.

He asked to be assigned to active service, was appointed as a member of the board of defense, and, during the siege, was commander-in-chief of the engineer force of the Paris army. It was in this capacity that he directed the work on the forts.

When sent to the National Assembly in 1871, by the department of Gard, he again took his old place in the right center, and afterward voted constantly with the Orleanists, especially on the 24th of May, 1873, against the order of the day, pure and simple, and against the motion not to accept the resignation of M. Thiers; on the 20th November, 1873, for the extension of the term of Marshal MacMahon; on the 18th of May, 1874, for the priority to be given to the political electoral law; and, finally, on the 15th of June last, against pressing the motion of Casimir Perier. When it last chose its officers, the National Assembly elected General Chabaud Latour as its vice-president.

It is reasonable to suppose that the new minister of the interior, who, we may remark, considers himself as holding his office ad interim, has preserved for the Orleans family the sentiments which have been those of his whole life—that is to say, sentiments of affection and gratitude; but it is equally certain that the Bonapartists cannot count upon finding in him the complaisance to which they were habituated by the conduct of M. Fourtou. His attitude in the Bazaine case gave sufficient evidence of this.

M. Mathieu Bodet was born at la Moulède (Charente) December 16, 1817. He took his degree as Doctor of Laws in 1842, and was admitted to practice in the court of appeals in 1845; he was elected to the Assembly in 1848, and while there always voted with the right, except on the question of the banishment of the Orleans family, for which he voted with the left. He was subsequently the secretary of the committee on budgets, in 1850 and 1851, and supported the policy of the prince-president until January 22, 1852. The famous decrees of that date caused him to leave the Bonaparte party, which he had, however, not abandoned after the 2d of December. Having returned to private life, he devoted himself entirely to his business as a practitioner before the council of state and the court of appeals. A reconciliation seems, meanwhile, to have taken place between him and the Orleans family, since that family engaged him to defend it before the council of state when the confiscation decree was issued.

M. Mathieu Bodet was chosen counselor-general for Charente under the empire; but, being desirous of re-entering political life, he made an unsuccessful effort in 1863 to get elected to the Corps Legislatif by the Charente district. In the month of February, 1871, he was more fortunate. His votes in the National Assembly do not render it possible to class him in any well-defined group. On the 24th of May, 1873, he voted against the order of the day, pure and simple, and consequently contributed to the departure of M. Thiers; on the 19th of June last, however, he voted to press the motion of M. Casimir Perier. This latter vote, and certain words which are attributed to him, gave ground for the belief that the new minister of finance belongs to the daily increasing number of deputies who are for a permanent republic.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, August 21, 1874. (Received September 3.)

SIR: As we are in the long recess of the National Assembly, and, without waiting for the expiration of the year, I have thought you might now be interested in a brief retrospect of the prominent events which have taken place in France since the first of January last. I have written you very fully from time to time in regard to what was taking place, together with my own appreciations of the situation, but what I now propose to do is to group together in one dispatch certain important incidents which have a real importance to all who are interested in the political affairs of France. In doing this, and in order not to break the thread of my narrative, I shall go over some ground more fully covered by my detailed dispatches.

THE SITUATION AT THE BEGINNING OF THE YEAR.

The close of the year 1873 was rather gloomy, but the first half had witnessed the accomplishment of three great objects, which had excited the wonder and admiration of all nations: the payment of the immense indemnity to Germany, the liberation of French territory, and the restoration of French national credit. But in the advent of the new year the political situation was not re-assuring. When the Assembly came together after the new year's recess the Duke de Broglie cabinet had to confront the fact that after having been in office some seven months it had not succeeded in definitively constituting the powers of Marshal MacMahon. After M. Thiers had been thrust from power by the skillful and extraordinary combination of all the hostile elements opposed to him, it was not long before the members of the extreme right began to give indisputable evidence of intractability and intolerance. The evidently increasing strength of republicanism in the country at that time added greatly to the annoyance of that division of the Assembly which could see no salvation except in the absolute triumph of unadulterated legitimacy. Whatever disposition the government might have had to yield something to the exigencies of public opinion, whatever action it might take in political affairs, it was almost certain to find the legitimists in the Assembly in compact opposition to it. In the presence of such discordant and clashing views an open rupture sooner or later was inevitable.

THE MAYOR'S BILL—FIRST REPULSE SUFFERED BY THE CABINET, JANUARY 9, 1874.

The first and open and public symptom of disagreement between the government and the right appeared on the subject of the mayor's bill, an account of which I gave you in my No. 918. Though the ministers had declared before the Assembly and the country that it would be impossible for them to govern without that law, and had made the immediate discussion of it a cabinet question, the right was in no way moved, but, on the other hand, the Marquis de Franclien, who belongs to that coterie in the Assembly denominated cheval-légers, because their enemies charge them with being equally inconsiderate, rash, and intransigent, made a proposition for the postponement of the measure. Notwithstanding the declaration of the ministers, and the imminence of a ministerial crisis, the motion of the marquis was carried by a majority of forty-two votes; thereupon the ministry immediately tendered their resignations. The President, however, believing that he might avoid a change in the ministry at this time, refused to accept them for the moment. Then a compromise was patched up, and the cheval-légers, going back on their action, gave the cabinet a vote of confidence and reconsidered the postponement of the mayor's bill. This sweeping measure was passed a few days afterward; it gives the government the appointment of all the mayors in France, and invests it with absolute control over seventy-two thousand communal officers.

THE UNIVERS NEWSPAPER INCIDENT—THE DECLARATION OF THE DUKE DECAZES, JANUARY 20, 1874.

This compromise between the cabinet and the right proved hollow and insincere. The cheval-légers still maintained an independent and haughty attitude, particularly on religious questions, the natural consequence of which was to greatly embolden the clerical party outside of the Assembly. The clergy, especially, soon forgot their usual prudence, and availed themselves of every opportunity of vindicating the claims of the Pope, and openly or impliedly censuring the German government. Such manifestations could not but touch the Berlin cabinet, and Mr. de Fourtou, then minister of public worship, found it necessary to send to the heads of the clergy an official circular, requesting more moderation and prudence on their part. This circular proved of no avail, for the bishops still persisted in their irritating language. The government was therefore called upon to take more decisive measures. It suspended for two months the most combative organ of the clerical party, the Univers, which had just published a mandement (bishops' charge) still more emphatic than the preceding ones. To this vigorous measure was added an earnest declaration of the Duke Decazes in the Assembly, on the occasion of an interpellation of General du Temple touching the policy adopted by the government in Italy. This declaration was to the effect that the government was firmly resolved to limit itself to filial sympathy toward the Pope, and to keep up with the Italian government, such as circumstances had made it, cordial and friendly relations. This frank statement, which so well conformed to the public sentiment, restored to the ministry a strength which was rather beginning to fail. It was especially favorable to the Duke Decazes, who from that time enjoyed an increased influence both in France and throughout Europe.

SCISSION BETWEEN THE EXTREME RIGHT AND THE CABINET—THE DURATION OF THE SEPTENNAT.

It only required some new incident to show how superficial was the harmony which apparently existed between the cabinet and the right. In order to explain the application of the "mayor's law" the vice-president of the council, the Duke de Broglie, had issued a circular, (January 23, 1874,) in which he spoke of the septennat as not revocable even by the sovereign Assembly. This was the first announcement of such a doctrine, either in the Assembly or elsewhere.

The members of the extreme right were startled by this bold declaration. They had always claimed the septennate as a mere temporary arrangement, doomed to disappear so soon as the Assembly should succeed in establishing a definitive government, which was in their estimation to call Henry the Fifth to the throne.

The most advanced organs of the party, the Union and the Gazette de France, immediately undertook to show that the prorogation law had not the meaning and significance attributed to it by the Duke de Broglie. There seems to be in this law a strange ambiguity, and it is now claimed that it was intentional, and used to secure the votes of all the various factions of the Assembly who stood in opposition to the supporters of Mr. Thiers. But when the vice-president of the council gave an official construction to the law which did not suit the views and purposes of the extreme right, who contributed so much to the overthrow of Mr. Thiers, these gentlemen became furious, and announced their determination to repay their adversaries for playing on them what they called a "parliamentary trick." It was at this time that the President took occasion to express his views on the subject in an address to the tribunal of commerce of Paris, (February 4, 1874.) In his address he declared plainly that he had been elected President irrevocably for seven years, and would defend his power till the end of that term. His frank and unequivocal language astonished the legitimists, who did not expect any such firm declaration. From that time they rallied all their forces in the Assembly, determined to overthrow the ministry on the very first occasion that should offer.

BONAPARTIST AND REPUBLICAN MOVEMENTS—ADJOURNMENT OF THE ASSEMBLY.

While the Assembly was the theater of all sorts of intrigues, the Bonapartists outside were not idle. On the 7th of February, 1874, they secured the election of their candidate for a vacancy in the Assembly, M. Seus, from the department of the Pas de Calais. Encouraged by this success, Prince Napoleon and M. Rouher each published letters a few days after. The former boldly declared that he did not acknowledge any government that had not been established by universal suffrage, while the latter, more cautious, accepting the septennate, pointed out at the same time the many and weighty objections to it. A few days after the Duke de Padone, through a government functionary, publicly invited the Bonapartists to go to Chiselhurst on the 16th of March, and pay their homage to the Prince Imperial on the occasion of his reaching his political majority. A large number of the "faithful" went on the mission, and among that number many government officials, in defiance of a circular of the Duke de Broglie forbidding any public functionaries from participating in the manifestation.

On their side the legitimists were up and doing, and seemed to fancy they had a chance of success. Even the Count de Chambord went so far as to announce that idea himself to M. Laurente, the director of the Union, in a letter published on the 21st of January, 1874.

Neither had the republican party remained idle. On the 7th of February they returned M. Herisson as a deputy to fill a vacancy from the Haute Saone, and on the 1st of March they elected as deputies to fill vacancies Ledru Rollin from the Vaucluse, and M. Lepetit from the Vienne. These three elections showed that the republicans were making obvious advances in public opinion. To sum up the whole business, outside of the Assembly the republicans and Bonapartists were alone gaining ground. As for the legitimists, they were simply the victims of a self-delusion. As to the Assembly itself, after three months of hard and real labor it took a recess from the 28th of March to the 12th of May, 1874.

THE SIXTEENTH OF MAY—THE DUKE DE BROGLIE'S CABINET OVERTHROWN.

On its return the Assembly was called upon to organize the powers of President MacMahon, as it was impossible to put off the question any longer. But the legitimists had made up their mind that, so far as they were concerned, they would not allow anything to be done that might impair their assumed right of restoring, whenever they could, the traditional monarchy. While acknowledging the legality of President MacMahon's powers, they contended that they were inseparable from his person; thus refusing to acknowledge the septennate as an institution. Their idea was this: "We accept the marshal, but only the marshal. He is in office, and we do not propose to remove him; but we maintain we have the right to do so whenever we choose; and should he die or resign, the septennate is at an end." Such was the position assumed by the two authoritative newspaper organs of the party, the Union and the Univers; the one representing pure legitimacy, the other the intransigent Roman Catholics. Both papers plainly declared that in the present state of affairs, should the cabinet presume to introduce the "constitutional law," the legitimists' party would take the act as a declaration of war. The ministers, under the pressure of public opinion, and of the members of the left, were obliged to accept the challenge and to bring forward the "laws." The proposed three bills: The first, and most important, provided for the transmission of powers in case of a vacancy in the presidency; the second created an upper chamber; while the third, and last, regulating the electoral system, was divided into two parts, the former concerning political and the latter municipal elections. Of these three laws, the first two only had a constitutional character, and were, therefore, the most obnoxious to the extreme right. In the interest of conciliation, the cabinet proposed to first discuss the political electoral law; but, apparently as a pretext, the right insisted that it had a constitutional character, and, through one of their most prominent members, M. Lucien Brau, demanded that the municipal electoral law should be first discussed. To this the Duke de Broglie interposed a formal and emphatic objection, thereby raising, squarely and directly, a question of cabinet; and here the cheval-légers found their opportunity. There was no discussion whatever, and, upon a vote being taken, it was found that the ministry was overthrown by a majority of sixty-two voices. In this memorable sitting, (May 16, 1874,) in which the friends of Mr. Thiers obtained a signal revenge, the cabinet had been opposed by fifty-two members of the extreme right, most of the Bonapartists, and all the fractions of the left. Thus fell suddenly, and, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye, the celebrated "De Broglie cabinet." Born of one coalition, it was summarily committed to an inhospitable grave by another.

THE TWENTY-SECOND OF MAY—THE DECAZES-FOURTOU CABINET.

The overthrow of the De Broglie cabinet left President MacMahon in an embarrassing position. According to parliamentary usage, he should have taken his new ministers from the victorious majority, but that was rendered impossible by the warring and incongruous elements of which that accidental majority happened to be composed. Hence, the ministerial crisis became very serious, and lasted a whole week. Finally, after attempting ten different combinations, not one of which was successful, the President constituted a new ministry belonging wholly to the minority. Three of the former ministers had been retained, M. Magne, for his influence in financial circles; the Duke Decazes, whose talents and diplomatic ability were universally acknowledged; and M. de Fourtou, whose energy and oratorical power were beginning to be noticed. M. Magne was a Bonapartist and former finance minister of the Emperor, the Duke Decazes was an Orleanist, while the tendencies of M. de Fourtou were undecided, but after a few weeks he sided more or less openly with the Bonapartists.

ACTION OF THE BONAPARTISTS, ETC.

The new ministry had hardly been constituted when the political factions, the plague of all countries where they exist, began new intrigues. The Bonapartists had been greatly encouraged by having elected a deputy to fill a vacancy in the Nièvre, (May 24, 1874,) the Baron de Bourgoing. At a previous election the department had gone strongly republican. In the face of such a real success, and finding themselves supported in the ministry by Messrs. Magne and de Fourtou, who, in all branches of their departments, put in men who had served the empire, the Bonapartists became aggressive and elated. On the 9th of June, Mr. Girerd, a republican deputy, produced before the assembly a document tending to show that the Bonapartists had a secret organization, contrary to law. M. Rouher flatly denied that such organization existed, and a stormy debate arose, in which M. Gambetta denounced the Bonapartists as "miserable," (villains.) This language incensed the members of the party to the highest degree, and caused an immense tumult in the body. When the incident became known in Paris, it produced a great sensation among the Bonapartists, who on the next day organized, at the St. Lazare railway-station, a manifestation against the republicans, in which M. Gambetta was insulted and attacked with personal violence. Some of the Paris journals grew very violent over this event, and the agitation increased. To put an end to this, the government suspended for the period of fifteen days three newspapers: the Pays, an ultra-Bonapartist organ; the Rappel, the organ of the radicals and the Hugo family; and the XIX^e Siècle, a republican conservative paper, but very violent in its anti-Bonapartist tendencies. This was on the 12th of June.

SECOND OF JULY—COUNT DE CHAMBORD'S MANIFESTO—INTERPELLATION OF THE EIGHTH OF JULY.

The agitation caused by the St. Lezare disturbance had hardly died away when a new incident arose: the "King" issued a manifesto. In this paper, written in a tone of apparent sincerity, and in an elevated and chivalrous style, Count de Chambord boldly addressed the French people. Commencing by the announcement "My birth has made me your King," he proceeded in eloquent language to exhort them to rally behind the "House of France," whose members were sincerely reconciled and could alone give them security and dignity. Unfortunately for the legitimists, and fortunately for the other parties in France, this manifesto said not a word of the only important question—the question of the flag. It was, indeed, like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. Hence it made no impression on the Assembly or the country. But the government could not permit such a paper, striking at the very foundation of its existence, to pass unnoticed. It deemed it its duty to adopt severe measures, and it therefore suspended the Union, an ultra montane journal of Paris, which had first published the document. This vigorous treatment greatly exasperated the legitimists, and, as I wrote you in a dispatch at the time, M. Lucien Brau, in their name, interpellated the government in the assembly. The debate on this interpellation took place on the 8th of July, and was one of the most exciting and serious that has ever taken place in the Assembly. The question raised by the legitimists was this: "By striking down the Union, and thus reaching Count de Chambord himself, did the government intend to deny the legitimists the right of restoring the monarchy?" In a clear, energetic, and, at times, eloquent speech, M. de Fourtou declared that such was the intention of the government. The septennate, he said in substance, is above all parties, and we will no more allow the legitimists than the republicans and Bonapartists to question its principle or its duration.

The situation being thus clearly stated, the votes were taken, first on the "order of the day," proposed by the legitimists, which, excluding from the debate the law of the 20th of November, 1873, (instituting the septennate,) blamed the suspension of the Union. This was rejected by an overwhelming majority of three hundred and seventy-nine votes. Then was considered another "order of the day," introduced by M. Paris, and accepted by the government, affirming the duration of President MacMahon's powers for seven years, but reserving constitutional questions. All parties in the Assembly who did not acquiesce in the sentiments expressed by M. de Fourtou touching the septennate, voted against this order of the day, and the ministry was defeated by a majority of thirty votes. But before the end of the sitting a proposition of the "order of the day pure and simple," (laying the whole subject on the table,) was introduced and adopted. The real meaning of this whole action was this, that the assembly opposed the government when it opposed the legitimists, and blamed it when it set up the septennate as irrevocable.

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT MACMAHON.

After that memorable sitting, where the right had unwittingly served all the other parties, the ministers felt bound to tender their resignations, but the President refused to accept them, and sent to the Assembly a very plain message, in which, after declaring his powers irrevocable, he declared that he would use in their defense such means as the law had placed at his disposal. He reminded the deputies of the obligations which they had assumed to give him constitutional laws, adding that he would instruct his ministers to specify such as were necessary. This emphatic message plainly indicated that the President had no leanings in favor of the republic. A fortnight later the government openly declared against it in the discussion of the bill of M. Casimir Perier.

RESIGNATION OF MESSRS. MAGNE AND DE FOURTOU.

Meanwhile a new modification of the ministry had taken place. M. Magne, defeated on a question concerning the budget, resigned on the 15th of July, and M. de Fourtou, having vainly endeavored to have his colleagues select another Bonapartist in place of his retired colleague, resigned, in his turn, July 20, 1874. The two vacancies were filled by the appointment of General de Chabaud-Latour, an avowed Orleanist, to the interior, and Matthieu Bodet, not belonging to any of the divisions of the assembly, but an Orleanist at heart, to the ministry of finance. Adding these two names to that of the Duke Decazes, the Orleanist princes have now a large influence in the MacMahon government.

REJECTION OF M. PERIER'S BILL.

A few days after July 23, the bill introduced by M. Casimir Perier was discussed, the urgency of which had been voted by the Assembly on the 15th of June. This bill declared that the republic was the definitive government of France, but at the same time provided that it might be revised. Had the cabinet declared in favor of the proposition, it would have been carried immediately, but at the beginning of the sitting in which it was to be discussed General de Cisse, speaking in the name of the government, read a declaration opposing it, and demanding instead thereof that laws should be made to more thoroughly organize the septennate, and especially that a second chamber should be created, and that the President should have the right to dissolve the lower assembly. In the discussion which followed the Duke de Broglie supported the government. His speech was able, bitter, and energetic, appealing skillfully to all the prejudices that could be evoked against a republic and republicanism. The bill was lost by a majority of forty-one votes. This result, which showed once more how utterly unable the Assembly was to organize anything, induced Mr. Leon Maleville to bring forward a motion for the dissolution of the Assembly. This motion was rejected on the 29th of July, by a vote of three hundred and seventy-five against three hundred and thirty-two. Devoting a few days most diligently to closing up the annual budget, on the 5th of August the Assembly adjourned over until November 30, 1874. This vacation has been well earned. Whatever political faults may be charged against the members, they cannot be reproached with any neglect of official duty, for they have addressed themselves diligently and intelligently to the practical legislation demanded by the country.

There are other matters I intended to allude to in this dispatch—the complaint of Spain against France in regard to supplies of war-material sent to the Carlists over the French border; the recognition of the Spanish republic by the European powers, Germany taking the lead here, but all following in the lead of the United States; and the result of the recent election in the Calvados. But this dispatch has already extended to such extreme length that I know you will be glad to have me postpone the discussion of these matters to some future time.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch, No. 1004, of the 24th July last, requesting to be informed in regard to the dissatisfaction which the Journal Officiel states exists in Philadelphia and elsewhere in the United States among French emigrants.

In reply, I transmit copy of a letter from the mayor of Philadelphia in answer to an inquiry from this Department as to the truth of the reports in question.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of 19th instant was received, inquiring as to dissatisfaction existing among French emigrants in this city.

No complaint of any kind has been made to this department in relation thereto. Since receipt of yours I have been informed the trouble grows out of misrepresentations made by the agents who induce the parties to emigrate, they being unable to procure work upon their arrival in this country, and not possessing means to return.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, July 23, 1873. (Received August 16.)

SIR: Frequent inquiries are addressed to the legation on the part of the authorities and the courts of justice here, as well as by individuals, respecting the genuineness of diplomas issued by the so-called "American University of Philadelphia."

One of the latest of these inquirers incloses the accompanying circular, which had been sent him. This paper, it will be observed, is stated to be "for private circulation." It offers to confer degrees and issue diplomas in all the branches of learning to persons in Europe, without requiring their presence, and indicates an agent in Jersey, England, as the person to whom application is to be made. I am informed that the price asked for the highest degree is $150.

I cannot think that any reputable institution in the United States would thus, underhand, offer to peddle its honors indiscriminately to any who would pay for them, and am led to hope that the enterprise may emanate altogether from England.

As much importance is attached to university degrees in Germany, and they are conferred with scrupulous care, their sale either by, or ostensibly on behalf of, a university with us, tends to bring our institutions of learning into disrepute, and is a detriment to the cause of letters everywhere.

I have thought it proper, therefore, to bring the matter to your attention, with a view to such measures being taken to expose and correct this abuse as may seem to you judicious.

PHILADELPHIA, 208 SOUTH FOURTH STREET,
March 6, 1873.

DEAR SIR: The letter from the Hon. Mr. Fish, with your indorsement, was this morning received.

An institution entitled the Philadelphia University of Medicine and Surgery did exist in Philadelphia, with power to confer degrees, but at the last session of the legislature its charter was repealed. Dr. William Paine was the dean of this institution.

An elaborate report was at that time made by a committee, appointed by the legislature, which recommended the repeal of several charters. The report was adopted, and a bill passed.

It is reported that by an oversight the bill then passed did not repeal the charter of one of the institutions it was designed to reach.

The title of the Philadelphia University of Medicine and Surgery caused it to be confounded with the University of Pennsylvania, causing much very serious annoyance to the authorities of the latter, with which I am connected as secretary and treasurer.

I remain, &c.,

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Philadelphia, September, 1871.

Frequent applications are made to the authorities of this university by gentlemen who desire to obtain honorary degrees. As these applications are made in evident ignorance of the rules which govern the university in conferring these degrees, as well as of the law of the State of Pennsylvania on the subject, it has been thought best to reprint the existing regulations.

Extract from the statutes of the university.

"Of honorary degrees in divinity, law, arts, and medicine :

"1. These may be conferred either at the instance of the faculty or in pursuance of a resolution of the board of trustees ; but no such degree shall be conferred unless the mandamus ordering the same be signed by two-thirds of the whole number of trustees, nor unless the candidate shall have been nominated at the board three months previously to taking the question on conferring the degree.

"2. The question on conferring an honorary degree shall always be decided by ballot, and the candidate must receive a unanimous vote.

"AN ACT to prohibit the sale of academic degrees.

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in general assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That it shall not be lawful for any university, college, or other institution incorporated under the laws of this State, with power to grant academic degrees, honorary or otherwise, to confer the same upon any person or persons upon the payment, or promise of payment, by any person, in consideration thereof ; and any person knowingly signing a diploma or other instrument of writing purporting to confer an academic degree when such consideration has been paid, or promised to be paid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and to undergo an imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, or either, at the discretion of the court.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, October 6, 1873. (Received October 30.)

SIR : While perfect freedom remains to all Germans that wish to emigrate to the United States, the governments of the several states are becoming impatient at the presence within their limits of agents of emigration, and in two or three instances such agents have been summarily directed to quit the state in which they prosecuted their business. Perhaps not every one of the agents has conducted himself discreetly, and, as far as I have been able to observe, they have brought to the United States no increase of desirable emigration. In some cases the agent is a naturalized German-American citizen again established in Germany, apparently without an intention to return to the United States, and, therefore, feeling no kind of responsibility to our Government. Of the motives to emigration, the most influential is the low price paid in Germany for agricultural labor, which has led many of the country-people to flock to the towns and cities and many to cross the Atlantic.

I have thought it incumbent on me to do what I could to restrain the arbitrary procedures of the local governments, and the only measure I could adopt is to ask that in every instance of expulsion there be notice given, with assignment of the reasons.

The books of Heffter and Bluntschli both authorize, and even recommend, this procedure, but both maintain the right of expulsion.

In two cases emigration agents have appealed to the legation. In one case it had been proved that the emigration agent had assisted a fraudulent bankrupt in escaping to America. The agent, in his conversation with me, did not so much deny the fact as insist on his own innocence, founded on his ignorance and good intention.

A second case is that of a commissioner of immigration from the State of Michigan, of whose personal character I have received the best accounts. I have, therefore, selected his case for a more formal statement to the government, of which I inclose a copy.

The beneficial results which I expect from this course are two: To increase the disinclination of the government to the use of this measure, and to obtain a clearer definition of the rights and duties of emigrant agents, so that in the pursuit of their business they may know how to avoid all violations of law.

Besides the above two cases of professional emigrant agents, three naturalized Americans of the neighborhood of Saarburg, in the district of Treves, have been recently sent over the frontier for alleged enticement of laborers to go to America. I brought the case to the attention of the Prussian government, which made its explanations, without reversing its decree.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, October 1, 1873.

MR. SECRETARY: In conformity with the suggestion of your excellency, that I should make a written communication on the subject of our yesterday's conversation respecting the recent expulsion of American citizens from the German Empire without trial by law or conviction of any offense, I do myself the honor to present some suggestions for your consideration.

There are two grounds on which the United States may claim the right to make representations on the subject.

I. As a question of international law, it is very clearly laid down by the highest German authorities that the government of which a citizen is thus expelled has a right to expect information of an expulsion and of the reason for it. Heffter, in his Europäisches Völkerrecht, § 33, vo., p. 64, lays down this rule:

“Kein Staat kann die gehörig legitimirten Unterthanen eines anderen befreundeten Staates zurückweisen, oder, nachdem sie einmal von ihm aufgenommen sind, wieder ausweisen ohne bestimmte ihrer Regierung mitzutheilenden Ursachen.”

II. Another ground exists in the treaty of May 1, 1828, between the King of Prussia and the American Republic, by the terms of which, as distinctly expressed in Article I, American citizens are at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of Prussia, and shall enjoy the same security and protection as natives of the country, on condition of their submitting to the laws and ordinances there prevailing.

There is another point of view which I desire to bring to your excellency's attention. The Government of the United States, equally with the German government, desires its citizens residing in a foreign country to conform scrupulously to the laws of the land. But when a new interpretation is put upon existing laws, or a different practice under them is suddenly followed, it is obviously desirable to give warning of the change in advance, in order to obviate its infringement.

The special case to which I now beg leave to direct the attention of your excellency is that of Mr. Allardt, now resident in Leipsic. He has published a pamphlet and an occasional newspaper on the subject of the State of Michigan. I inclose the pamphlet and specimens of those papers for your exact information, and I cannot but agree with the observation of your excellency, that the simple publication of information is not an offense or a breach of German law. So far as I know, it is not charged against Mr. Allardt that he has ever attempted to persuade any person to emigrate to America.

I beg leave further to add, that, as far as Mr. Allardt is known to this legation, he is held to be a man of truth and honor, and every way worthy of esteem. Yet he has been expelled and a respite of but one week allowed him for his preparations.

I inclose the papers in his case, with the request, first, that a delay may be granted him until the question of his expulsion may receive further consideration; and, next, I would ask permission for him to continue to reside in the German Empire, obeying its laws, which, so far as he is informed, he has not violated.

I gladly avail myself of the occasion to renew to your excellency the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

GEO. BANCROFT.

P. S. Dr. Bluntschli, in section 384, of the second edition of his “Modernes Völkerrecht,” fully confirms the opinion of Heffter.

No. 245.

Mr. Bancroft to Mr. Fish.

No. 532.]

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, October 27, 1873. (Received November 14.)

SIR: I annex to this letter an authentic copy, in its original Italian, of the letter of the Pope to the Emperor William, of August 7, of this year. The effect of the correspondence has been only to increase the popularity and European reputation of the Emperor, and to depress the influence of the clerical party, thus confirming the accounts which I have always given you that the ultramontane political influence can never become vitally dangerous in this empire. The Catholic clergy are obviously beginning to regret having commenced with the state a contest in which it is not possible for them to gain the advantage. The intelligent Catholics themselves, for the most part, support the government, and so have received from the ultramontanes the nick name of State Catholics. This controversy has nothing new about it, unless it be that the Emperor, whom the Pope arraigns, is a Protestant. I need not remind you that in the last century Charles III, King of Spain, made this very question the test in his selection of his ministers, and the Spanish language has a word to designate it, Regalismo, the authority of the state, as opposed to papal interference. The matter was pushed so far at that time, that the King of Spain, aided by the courts of France and Portugal, obtained the total abolition of the order of Jesuits, as it was supposed, forever. I interpret the assumption in our age of a power which was given up by the Roman See a hundred years ago as evidence of a consciousness of the decline of papal authority, and as a desperate attempt to recover it. The attitude of the Emperor William is not only approved by many of the most enlightened Catholics in his own dominions, but also by the majority of the influential Catholics in Austria. Two and a half centuries ago the house of Austria, possessed of the crown of the Holy Empire, was very near extirpating from Germany the Protestant faith. And now the descendant of the principal Protestant prince of that day has obtained not the crown of the old Holy Roman Empire, as it was called, but of the German Empire, and is welcomed at Vienna by the Austro-Hungarian Emperor, with the most marked manifestations of friendship, among them the honorary command of a regiment in the Austro-Hungarian army.

The general result of all is, that Europe, alike Catholic and Protestant, is sick of the boundless pretensions of the Roman See, and is seeking how to avoid papal influence on the external and internal political relations of the state.

The special results for the moment in Germany are a confirmation of opposition to those pretensions, which will manifest itself in the elections for the next legislature of Prussia and in the approaching elections for the German Diet. In foreign affairs the result is a union of the eastern powers in favor of peace; that is to say, in favor of leaving the unity of Italy undisturbed, so that the temporal power of the Pope is as likely to be restored as that of the King of Naples.

AUGUST 7, 1873.

YOUR MAJESTY: All the measures which have been taken for some time by the government of Your Majesty look more and more to the destruction of Catholicism. When I reflect upon the causes which may have given rise to these most harsh measures, I confess that I can see none at all. I am told that Your Majesty does not approve the conduct of your government or the severity of the steps taken against the Catholic religion. If, however, Your Majesty does not approve, and the letters which you have heretofore written sufficiently show that you cannot approve all that is now being done; if Your Majesty, I say, does not approve this, how is it that your government continues in the path which it has entered, constantly increasing the rigor of its measures against the religion of Jesus Christ, which, while they do so much harm to that religion, are only undermining Your Majesty's throne, as you may rest assured? I speak with frankness, because truth is my banner, and I speak in order to do my whole duty, which obliges me to tell the whole truth, even to those who are not Catholics, inasmuch as whoever is baptized belongs in some measure, and in a manner which this is not the proper place to explain, to the Pope. I feel convinced that Your Majesty will receive these my reflections with your usual courtesy, and will take such steps as the case requires, while, with all regard, I pray God to unite you with me through the bonds of charity.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, November 12, 1873. (Received December 8.)

SIR: The newly-elected Prussian Diet came together to-day. On account of the illness of the King, the opening speech, of which I inclose a copy, was made to them by Mr. Camphausen, now vice-president of the ministry. The character of the house is liberal. The Catholics of Prussia form about one-third of the population, and the ultramontanes have but a fifth of the representation. This is a gain to them of several votes; but, on the other hand, the party representing the extreme of orthodox Lutheranism and so-called feudalism has disappeared. In a house of four hundred and thirty members, the extreme radicals, the extreme conservatives, the ultramontanes, the discontented and all but disloyal Poles, taken together, count scarcely one hundred and thirty votes against three hundred who are united on the basis of attachment to the unity of Germany and to the progress of liberal principles in legislation.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, November 21, 1873. (Received December 11.)

SIR : I received your instruction No. 626 just as I was on the point of reporting the circumstances of the expulsion of three persons from the district of Saarburg, mentioned in my No. 527, having had my last interview on the subject with this government on the 19th.

The legation received, on August 1, a communication from Luxembourg, signed Peter Puhl, Johann Wirtz, and Peter Blasius, complaining that they, American citizens, had been ordered out of German territory.

The legation at once addressed a note in their behalf to the foreign office, and subsequently, in a personal interview, and again in writing, renewed the application. The legation was, meanwhile, left by the parties, notwithstanding its repeated requests for definite information and proofs, in great uncertainty as to the merits of the case.

When, therefore, the reply of the government was received, approving the expulsion and assigning as its reason that the persons expelled had violated the laws of the land by enticing laborers to emigrate, the legation could make no further representation; nor have these persons, since they have been informed of the ground of their expulsion, given any satisfactory account of their real business in Germany although repeatedly urged to do so. They have, however, remained in Luxembourg, just over the German border, whence they have recently addressed to me a further appeal, still failing to state what is the real business for which they wish to return to Saarburg.

The legation has taken great pains to solicit the facts from the complainants, but without success. They confine themselves to affirming that their business in Saarburg was not to entice workmen to emigrate, without disclosing what is their object there.

On the other hand the German government has exhibited to me the reports of its officials, and assures me that the matter has received the most thorough and impartial investigation; that as the result of that investigation it appears that these men were agents of manufacturers in America to induce the emigration of workmen from Saarburg, where there are large manufacturing establishments; that they pursued their agency with considerable success; and that in the procedure they violated the laws of the kingdom.

Here there was a direct conflict of statement between the complainants themselves and the German government which I was not able to reconcile; but, on the one hand, the legation had only the naked denial of the men; on the other, official documents reporting the results of the investigation.

I inclose copies of the notes exchanged with the government on the subject.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, August 4, 1873.

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, has the honor to bring to the notice of his excellency Mr. Von Philipsborn, in charge of the foreign office, the inclosed letter, signed by Peter Puhl, Johann Wirtz, and Peter Blasius, who describe themselves as being American citizens, temporarily sojourning in the district of Saarburg for purposes of business, and complaining that they have been, without notice and without any reason being assigned, forcibly expelled from German territory. As this legation has received no notice from the imperial government of an intention to expel from its territory any citizens of the United States, and no information of the grounds for the expulsion of the persons in question, the undersigned entertains no doubt that the proceeding complained of is the unauthorized act of merely subordinate officials, and that the imperial government will take pleasure in restoring his countrymen to the enjoyment of the hospitality which it extends to foreigners within its borders. As the persons in question have been forced to seek temporary refuge in Luxembourg, where they are detained at great inconvenience and loss, the undersigned would be glad to be as early as possible enabled by his excellency to assure them that they may return in safety upon German soil.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, September 9, 1873.

The undersigned, envoy of the United States of America, has the honor once more to call the attention of his excellency Mr. Von Philipsborn, in charge of the foreign office, to the case of three American citizens in the district of Saarburg who, without assignment of any reason and without notice to this legation, have been expelled from German territory. The undersigned begs to refer to the communication on this subject addressed to his excellency as long ago as the 4th day of August last, and to the verbal renewal of the application on the 20th of August, and expresses the hope that the earliest practicable steps will be taken for the relief of his distressed countrymen.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his excellency, Mr. Von Philipsborn, the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

BERLIN, September 18, 1873.

The undersigned has the honor to reply to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. Bancroft, while returning the inclosure of his letter, in answer to his esteemed notes of the 4th and 9th instant, that according to the report of the royal Prussian administration in Treves, Peter Blasius, John Wirz, and Peter Puhl emigrated some years since from Nitten. Having returned thither, they endeavored, by means of misleading representations and promises, to entice Prussian subjects to emigrate. In concordance with the provisions of the law, the above-mentioned persons consequently received notice to quit the country for enticing Prussian subjects to emigrate. The royal Prussian government, therefore, is not able to permit the return of Peter Blasius, John Wirz, and Peter Puhl to the kingdom.

Referring it to the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to call the attention of the aforesaid three persons to the illegality of their conduct, the undersigned takes this opportunity to renew the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, December 1, 1873. (Received December 19.)

SIR: The tendency of Europe is toward the American system of separating church and state. Here a twofold development is going forward. On the one side there is an inflexible determination to enforce the supremacy of the state over all its citizens. In the pursuit of this object the government has gone so far as to demand of the archbishop of Posen his resignation. No doubt he will refuse, and a legal process for his deposition will ensue. He will then undoubtedly deny the validity of the act of deposition by civil authority; but the government will persevere in its purpose, though it does not conceal from itself the difficulty of the undertaking.

On the other hand, a step in the other direction is proposed, and is received with a very general approval. The clergy of the several denominations now keep the record of marriages, baptisms, and deaths, and so in fact perform most important civil offices, on which the transmission of all the property of the country, from one generation to another, depends. They also have some power to restrain freedom of marriage. At present a Jew and a Christian cannot intermarry, and obstructive forms precede the marriage of a Catholic and a Protestant, the marriage of Protestants of different denominations, and the marriage of one not avowing himself a Christian with another who is a Christian. A law is in preparation, soon to be brought before the Prussian Diet, making civil marriage obligatory, and intrusting to civil officers the registry of marriages, births, &c. The measure is required by the necessities of the times, since in many Catholic parishes there is no priest or curate whom the law recognizes; and since often the priests who are recognized forbid marriages between a Catholic who accepts the new dogma of papal infallibility and the old Catholic who rejects it. The measure is a long stride toward making the separation of church and state possible.

The Prussian finances are in a splendid condition. In the last year forty millions of their very inconsiderable debt has been discharged, and forty millions more of a contingent debt liquidated. The money-market here has been disturbed, but the sound principles on which the finances are administered has saved the business of the kingdom from disaster. The secretary of the treasury was asked to intervene in behalf of those who were in trouble, and wisely refused to do so. In this way the suffering has been confined as nearly as possible to those who were speculating on borrowed capital, or on no capital at all.

Yours, &c.,

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, December 8, 1873. (Received December 27.)

SIR: I inclose a copy of the correspondence between the chief president of the Prussian province of Posen and Count Ledochowski, the archbishop of Gnesen and Posen. The antagonism between civil and ecclesiastical power which has here received its strongest expression, is one of which the importance can hardly be rated too high. It is direct and absolute. The president recapitulates the laws of the kingdom which the archbishop has violated, and the archbishop represents himself as above those laws by the authority of the Pope, whom he calls the representative of God, and in his own right as appointed to rule his diocese by the Holy Ghost. With these pretensions the archbishop takes no pains to draw a limit to the questions in which he may interfere, and the Catholic clergy in fact use all their power at the polls and in political discussions of all kinds through the press. The Prussian government is fully aware of the difficulties attending the contest in which they have engaged; but they profess no disposition to recede from their determination to cause the power of the state to be respected by every citizen of the state. Toward the archbishop the steps that are threatened are depositions and the removal of his place of residence to some other part of the kingdom.

Meantime the bishopric of Fulda remains vacant. If the Pope pursues his principles to their logical consequence, he will, contrary to all precedent, himself alone assume alike the appointment and the investiture of a new bishop.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, December 15, 1873. (Received January 5, 1874.)

SIR: The Prussian government have brought in their new law transferring from the clergy to civil officers the registry of births, marriages, and deaths. The law avoids all possibility of conflict with any church. Every child, within a week of its birth, must be reported to the proper civil officer of the place, for registry, with the family name and the names given him; or if the parents have not decided on the latter, they may at any time within two months be added to the record. At the baptism of the child names may be given at will. The state takes cognizance only of those entered in its own registry. Marriage is to be preceded by a two-week publication at the town-house of the place of residence of one of the betrothed. The parties then appear before the proper magistrate, and in the presence of two witnesses make an affirmative answer to the question whether they wish to take each other in marriage. On the affirmative answer the magistrate declares them to be married. Whatever religious ceremonies may attend the nuptials, the state takes cognizance only of the act of its official. Every death is to be registered at latest on the day following the death.

Simple as are the main features of the law, they will effect a very great change in the social and religious life of Germany.

Marriages between members of different religious confessions, and of Jews with Christians, will henceforward be attended with no legal obstacles, nor made to depend on the caprices of the clergy.

* * * * *

Thus there is a sort of stamp-tax on newspapers, which the liberal party has long desired to repeal; this repeal may perhaps now be effected.

The house does not divide itself into two parties. The members separate themselves into eight fractions, as they are called, with a ninth fraction to include those that attach themselves to no one of them all. There are the national liberals, with 170 members; the ultramontanes and their adherents, with 86; the party of progress, or more radical-liberal party, with 72; the free conservatives, who are essentially a liberal party, with 33; the new conservatives, with 24; the Poles, with 17; the liberal center, with 5; the old conservative fraction is reduced to 4. There are fifteen who attach themselves to no fraction, and to this class belong among others the ministers and the president of the diet. Besides all these there are six vacancies. Thus there are but 86 who can be relied upon for opposition to the national liberals, and where these 86 vote for a liberal measure the vote of the house approaches unanimity. The party of the old nobility, sometimes called the feudal party, and sometimes the party of the country squires, has, as you see, almost entirely disappeared. Our Congress does not more completely represent the people as it is than the Prussian Diet represents the people of Prussia. Only here there is an artificially constituted upper house, which is not so much in harmony with the country.

In Prussia the system of schools is national. The school includes the children of all parents. In Bavaria, where the majority of the population is Catholic, under a Catholic royal family, the Roman bishops made a representation against the establishment of schools composed of children of all confessions; but the government has decided against their demand, a new advantage gained for the principle of the Prussian system.

Switzerland shows no sign of receding from its comprehensive measures against the ultramontane usurpations; and the spirit and courage of these republicans have something of the same effect on the population of Germany that was exercised by their forefathers in the time of the Reformation.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, December 22, 1873. (Received January 12, 1874.)

SIR: The President's message, in full, reached Berlin on Friday last. That part of it which related to foreign affairs has met with the most perfect and universal approbation that I have ever known accorded to a public document. The conduct of the United States toward Spain and Cuba is acknowledged to be marked by strict respect for public law, by moderation, by wise forbearance, by dignity and firmness. There is division of opinion on the subject in public or in private circles.

* * * * *

The finances of the United States are here a subject of the intensest interest, owing to the very large amounts which Germans have invested in our national and other securities. The use of paper-money in the United States has led to many purely speculative undertakings, which have sought a market for their securities in this country. Between fifty and sixty separate securities—I think the exact number is fifty-eight—which sought and found a market here have failed to pay their interest as it became due. This has had an unhappy effect upon the public financial opinion. Four years ago this public believed the United States were about to return without delay to a specie currency. As a consequence, public confidence in our stocks was constantly on the increase. When such marvellously large payments of our debt were made, it was taken for granted that those payments would be accompanied by a return of the Government, through all its obligations, to specie payments, according to the pledge of the first act of the Forty-first Congress. Nations are here divided into those which have a forced paper circulation and those which have a specie basis, and the difference in the prices of the stocks of the two is amazingly great. Our 6 per cent. stocks were rising, and there was every reason to hope that the price would soon be far above par.

The remoteness of the United States had come to be thought lightly of, and there was even a rising belief that there was a peculiar safety attending their stock resulting from the very fact that they stood apart and beyond the reach of convulsions in Europe. There still remains unshaken confidence in their determination and in their ability to pay their bonded debt, but the seemingly indefinite postponement of the epoch when they intend to remove the use of force in keeping their notes in circulation seriously affects financial opinion. This change manifests itself in various ways. Where purchases are made of stocks, those falling due first are most sought after by those who have safety in view, and there is less disposition to engage in any new loans which the United States might be disposed to invite.

You will not be surprised, therefore, when I say that the judgment of the President "that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached," is responded to here with absolute unanimity, coupled further with the idea, which is, indeed, involved in the President's words, that we never can attain the credit which we have a right to hope for in the financial market of the world until that specie basis is reached. The next point in our finances on which public opinion in Germany is perfectly unanimous is, in the language of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which accompanies the President's message, that "a constant increase of coin in the Treasury would, ere long, lead to the desired result." There is not one single well-wisher to the United States in these parts that does not cordially welcome and approve that suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is the absolutely unanimous opinion of all financial men. I hear it in all circles, from men of all political parties, but most earnestly expressed by those who are our truest friends. Severest economy and an accumulation of gold in the Treasury can alone bring us back to specie payments; and they can do it, and with less difficulty and less delay than are anticipated. As the country is constantly increasing in business, it is the further universal belief here that the earlier the country returns to specie payments the less will the debtor class suffer.

Thus far I have given you a candid and exact statement of what is the universal financial opinion in this region. There is another suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, that "there should be a gradual accumulation of gold in the banks," which meets with approbation wherever it has engaged attention, but it is not every one who has turned his attention to that branch of the subject. But all who have given attention to it are of the opinion expressed by the Secretary on that point, and not as a temporary but as a permanent measure.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

SIR: In my No. 5 to Mr. Seward of September 12, 1867, and No. 519 to yourself, September 15, 1873, I have carefully stated the condition of the negotiation between Denmark and Germany on their boundary in Jutland. Both those dispatches were written with the very best information, and you will not be misled if you give to them your entire confidence. There is no reserve here on the part of the government in speaking with me on the subject. The assurances made to me are—

Nothing has passed between the two governments on the subject of the North Schleswig boundary for several years. We were glad that the Crown Prince on his return from Sweden was well received by the royal family in Denmark. We desire in return to take every opportunity to manifest our respect and regard for that royal family. We shall do everything to cultivate with them the most friendly relations, having common interests. The produce of Jutland seeks its market in Hamburg, and its business relations are with Germany. A better disposition is gradually manifesting itself. It would have been well if, in 1866, immediately after the peace, the question of boundary had been settled. But the Danes demanded too much. The military officers say that Alsen must on no account be given up, for strategical reasons. The Emperor cannot bear the idea of parting with a place which was purchased so dearly. Nothing has since been done, nothing is now doing, on the boundary question.

This information you will receive as perfectly trustworthy from an unquestionable and authoritative source.

As to Saint Thomas, Germany does not want it, would not accept it as a gift; has no hankering after that or any other West India colony; from principle avoids them; wishes at most a coaling station in Asiatic seas, and that only in case it can be enjoyed in security without being made a military post. This statement I have had often from every member of the government that could by any possibility have charge of any negotiation made for the acquisition of territory. They have said it to me over and over again. This much in answer to a telegram received night before last through General Schenck.

SIR: On the 6th instant I received the following telegram in cipher from our minister at London:

I have just received the following which I am instructed to transmit to you and Kramer at Copenhagen. A report reaches here that Germany is in treaty with Denmark for the acquisition of her West India Islands, proposing to fulfill her existing treaty and to cede North Schleswig. Inquire discreetly and ascertain the truth of the report. Transfer of the possession of those islands to another European power could not be regarded with favor by this Government.

I had just time to send you, by the Bremen steamer of Saturday, an answer on the subject, and to-day I can only affirm what I have written on former occasions.

It is on the highest authority that I assure you that the boundary negotiations between Denmark and Germany have not been renewed.

Further, in time past I am very certain that the idea has never been entertained on either the side of Denmark or of Germany to transfer Saint Thomas to the latter power. As to the present I cannot find the slightest reason to believe that any such negotiation is on foot or even in contemplation.

The decisions in the Alabama case respecting the extent to which a neutral power may furnish coals to a war-ship of a belligerent have naturally brought home to the German navy department a sense of the feebleness of their position in foreign seas in the event of a war, and so may have given rise to the wish for the possession of coaling stations, especially in the eastern Asiatic seas. But it does not change their general policy not to hold in foreign seas posts that would but be new points for attack for a fleet in time of war.

His excellency the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, Mr. Bancroft, has been pleased, in his esteemed note of the 9th of this month, to express to the undersigned the wish to receive more exact information respecting a statement contained in the Ulmer Schnellpost, that a criminal by the name of Rohrer, condemned for triple murder, had received a pardon upon condition of emigration to America.

The undersigned has not failed to request of the royal ministry of justice information on the subject, and has the honor, as the result of his inquiry, to communicate to his excellency that neither to a criminal by the name of Rohrer, nor to any other criminal condemned for murder, has a pardon under condition of emigration to America been either offered or granted; and, moreover, that pardons on this condition are not granted.

The undersigned has the honor respectfully to add that possibly the statement in question may have confounded the case of Johannes Roser, of Laupheim, condemned to imprisonment for eighteen years, to whom, after serving out the half of this term, in consideration of his exemplary conduct in the prison, and upon occasion of the birthday of His Majesty, the remainder of his sentence was by royal decree of the 4th of this month remitted upon condition of permanent absence from the German Empire.

The undersigned takes with pleasure this occasion to renew the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, March 30, 1874. (Received April 18.)

SIR: The Imperial Diet has adjourned, to meet again on the first Thursday after Easter.

The bill for establishing compulsory civil marriage for all the German Empire passed the Diet by a considerable majority.

The measures enforcing the authority of the state over the pretensions of a foreign potentate to higher allegiance is also made a matter of legislation for the general government. I have often reminded the Department of the fact that in several of the separate German states the old nobility has power enough to stop the progress of liberal legislation. It is, therefore, natural to choose to bring liberal measures before the German Diet, where the old nobility has no prerogatives whatever.

A desire has been manifested to make some change in the form of proceeding against bishops and archbishops who set themselves above the jurisdiction of the state.

Attaching and selling their property, shutting them up in prison, have too much the appearance of persecution; it is proposed to imitate the example set by Switzerland, and instead of imprisonment, to forbid any recusant prelate to reside in his diocese.

There is every reason to believe that the measure will be adopted. Even Catholic Bavaria accepts the laws, which, however, in the present state of Bavarian legislation, will never be applied to a Bavarian prelate.

But the great measure of the session is the bill for the organization of the imperial army.

The government desires larger appropriations for the army, an increase of its numbers, and a character of permanence to its organization.

The Diet desires modifications on all these points; but every one of those with whom I have spoken has assured me that the bill will pass with no other amendments than such as the government could readily accept. Yet anxiety prevails, especially in the mind of the Emperor, and it will prevail until the question is settled.

* * * * *

The Emperor, I am glad to say, is very much himself again. He received a multitude of visits on his birthday, and in the evening staid with his guests till long after midnight, going around among them all, as of old, and having a cheerful word for every one.

Berlin, April 13, 1874. (Received May 1.)

SIR: The all-important question which has agitated the mind of the German people for the last two months has been the manner in which the standing army of the empire should be established. The government, in its anxiety on the score of its foreign relations, desired to see it voted once for all, without limitation of time, and therefore independent of the action of future legislatures. On the other hand, the number of the army was considered as a question to be discussed annually on occasion of the grant of supplies, as in England, France, and Italy. During the recess of the Diet for the Easter holidays the threatened collision was very thoroughly discussed with the people, and everywhere deprecated. A strong sentiment of gratitude to the Emperor for his resistance to ultramontane influences was manifested, and is evidently increasing in depth and vigor. The constant menace on the part of France, and the uncertainty of affairs in the Orient, had their influence. A very strong wish, therefore, prevailed to give to the imperial government sincere, hearty, and efficient support. On the other hand, to vote an army of 400,000 men for an indefinite period seemed to the people a dangerous surrender of the first principles of constitutional government.

As a consequence, the national liberal party, acting with perfect unanimity, have offered to vote the numbers of the regular army thought necessary by the government for a period of seven years.

* * * * *

The government measure, with this amendment, is now sure of being adopted by a considerable majority. The Diet will, therefore, have but a very short session.

The ultramontanes may bring on acrimonious debates; they can neither defeat nor alter the measures which they oppose.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 21, 1874.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 28th of March, marked "Separate," in relation to the presentation by you at the courts of Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, and Hesse of letters of recall on the occasion of your retirement from the post at Berlin, has been received, and the subject has been carefully considered.

On examination of the precedent established in the case of Mr. Wheaton, who while minister at Berlin was empowered to conclude treaties with other German states, it is found that it was not deemed expedient at that time to authorize Mr. Wheaton to present special letters of recall. The Department regards the decision then made as correct, and adheres to it in the present case.

Letters of recall to the Emperor of Germany are inclosed, and in presenting them you will express to the Emperor the satisfaction with which the President entertains the conviction that your mission has tended to cement the cordial relations of amity and good feeling which he desires to maintain and preserve between two powers which have become kindred in every sense of the word.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, April 27, 1874. (Received May 13.)

SIR: The Emperor in person prorogued the Imperial Diet yesterday. Four of its measures are of high importance. The army bill was passed finally by a majority of more than ninety. The number of the army was fixed for a period of seven years. The Emperor, in his speech on closing the Diet, could not withhold an expression of his regret that it had not been voted without limit. All agree that Germany must show that she is strong, if she will maintain herself in independence and peace.

Several of the separate states had issued a disproportionate amount of current notes. They are all now subjected to one rule. The circulating notes of them all, collectively, are not to exceed 40,000,000 of thalers, or 28,800,000 of our dollars. But time is allowed to those states whose issues are in excess of the average to reduce their emissions by persistent, gradual reductions. The German paper notes are therefore to be a little less than 72 cents per head of the population of the empire. The late proposal for American greenbacks was an average of about fourteen dollars per head, or nearly twenty times the amount which is thought safe in Germany; and even the amount allowed in Germany is a concession to what was found existing rather than an original and independent measure. A very considerable proportion of the house and of the country are opposed to this sort of measure altogether; and on behalf of the government an excuse has been put forward that, if it tolerates the circulation of forty millions of paper money, it has set apart in its vaults forty millions in gold not to be touched for the annual expenses in time of peace.

A third important measure was the law regulating the press, in which all the changes are for the better. Hitherto, in Prussia, the police had power to suppress an issue of a newspaper, and the proprietors had no redress but by an appeal to the tribunal, which could really furnish no reasonable and sufficient relief. This power is now limited to cases of high treason. A sort of stamp-tax has been remitted, which was so heavy that on the leading newspaper in Cologne it amounted to more than 50,000 thalers a year.

The fourth law relates to ecclesiastics who set themselves up above the laws. They may now be sent out of the country, but with a proviso giving power to the courts to protect them against capricious acts of the magistrates. The law was carried by almost absolute unanimity, except the ultramontanes and the Poles. The Department will at one glance see the importance of the measure. There are in Prussia twelve Catholic bishoprics. One of these bishops has already been deposed. Should he continue to exercise his functions in spite of his deposition by the temporal authority, he will be immediately sent out of the country. The other eleven must respect the laws, or they will be dealt with in the like manner. To leave the Catholic population of the country without bishops opens the way for many chances of change; and the Catholic hierarchy must die out, or, as has happened in Russia, exercise its functions in subordination to the power of the state.

There is no political question on which the great majority of Germany is so determined as on this. The new law was borrowed from the example of Switzerland. How widely the movement is extending in Europe is seen by what is passing in England, where choice has been made of a ministry disinclined to further concessions to the demands of the Catholic hierarchy, and where the archbishops of the Anglican church are proposing measures to drive all Romanizing tendencies out of the forms of public worship in the establishment. Here in Germany, where the question takes the form of a conflict between the authority of the state at home, within its own precincts, and the influence of an alien ecclesiastical power, it is certain that the party of the state is consolidating its strength; and I see nothing either in the history of the country or in the present state of public opinion, or the development of public legislation, which can raise a doubt as to the persistency of the German government in the course upon which it has entered.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose to you herewith the translation of a note received to-day from the secretary of state for foreign affairs, dated June 24, calling attention to an order issued by the district court of the United States at New York, directing the sworn testimony of German citizens at Aix-la-Chapelle and other places in Germany to be taken by the United States consuls at those posts, and objecting to the same as attributing to said consuls functions not warranted by the provisions of Article IX of the American-German consular convention.

According to intelligence which has reached the undersigned, the district court of the United States for New York has, in a suit brought by the officers of the custom-house at New York against the branch there established of the firm of S. U. Wolff & Co., of Cassel, issued an order, upon motion of the United States district attorney, directing that the American consuls at Aix-la-Chapelle, Frankfort, Berlin, and Leipzig, or their authorized agents, with assistance of United States commissioners to be specially sent to Europe for that purpose, shall take the sworn testimony of German subjects in the said cities and other places within the German Empire.

The undersigned believes that no elaborate representation is requisite to make it clear that the functions attributed to the consular officers of the United States in the German Empire by this order of the court cannot be derived from the provisions of Article IX of the German-American consular convention.

The undersigned, satisfied that his ardent wish that every cause for difference of opinion between two so friendly governments may be avoided will be in the fullest degree shared by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, Mr. Bancroft, believes that he may restrict himself to the present statement, and seizes with pleasure this occasion to renew to Mr. George Bancroft the expression of his most distinguished consideration.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, June 29, 1874. (Received July 23.)

SIR: The ministry of the interior is becoming every day more strict in searching out those who evade their military duty in Germany by passing time enough in America to become nominally citizens of the United States, with the intent to use that right of citizenship only as a plea to escape military duty in the country of their birth and domicile. When the treaties were negotiated with South Germany, Bavaria insisted on an article that its citizens, if they became citizens of the United States, though they may visit Bavaria on business, cannot establish themselves permanently there, until the years of liability to military duty shall have come to an end. This provision I recommended at the time to our Government for adoption, and it received the approval of the President and Senate of that day. The result has been excellent; the treaty has been carried out in Bavaria without the slightest difficulty or complaint on either side during the years that have passed since its ratification.

The Prussian government is now inclined to gain the same security for itself, against fraudulent naturalization, by applying the fourth article of the naturalization treaty of North Germany to cases of that kind.

To a young man from the Rhenish Provinces who applied to me for protection, with a frank avowal that his only object in retaining his American citizenship was to escape military duty here, but for which he should have returned to his allegiance to Prussia, I replied that our Government could not allow its citizenship to be thus fraudulently used; and I limited my offer of protection to procuring for him the free right of returning to the United States.

In another case from Alsace there seemed every appearance that our citizenship had been gained with no other view than to avoid duties of citizenship in Europe, and I therefore in like manner limited my offer of interference.

A third case has come up, where certainly the appearances implied that our citizen-papers were abused for the simple purpose of escaping military duty here. But this time the government threatened to seize the young man and put him into the army. To this I have demurred. It seems to me that we can never consent to put such a construction on the fourth article as this procedure would imply. I have had repeated conversations with Mr. President Delbrück, and with Mr. Von Bülow, the secretary of state, and have taken the ground that the article of the treaty cannot be so interpreted. The last half of the fourth article is permissive, not mandatory. The words are: "The intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides more than two years in the other country." The United States secure to themselves by the article the right of avoiding complications with the German government in cases where it is plain that the naturalized citizen has no just claim to its interference; and in like manner, the German government has an acknowledgment of its right to look into the circumstances of the case where every appearance implies that the naturalization is fraudulent. I have therefore insisted that the naturalized American, who has the appearance of having obtained naturalization solely to escape military service, should have a right to establish his sincerity by electing to take up his residence in the United States.

The instance of Mr. Mentheim Cohn, respecting whom I annex a translation of a letter from Mr. Von Bülow, is the only one in which the claim has been put forward of a right to summon at once to military duty a person who gives every appearance of having been insincere in his naturalization. Both the minister for foreign affairs and Mr. Delbrück appeared to me to accord with me. My interpretation is warranted by the constant practice since the treaty was formed, and by the interpretation of the fourth article in the protocols of every one of the four southern states. I may say, in the very case of Mr. Cohn, it has received the approbation of the government. I gave him a passport for the United States, and, as far as I know, he has not been further interfered with.

In this manner I hope that the seeming discrepancy of opinion is reconciled, and that my successor, on entering on the duties of his office, will find no question left for discussion between the legation and the German government.

Mr. von Bülow to Mr. Bancroft.

BERLIN, May 29, 1874.

In pursuance of the note of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Mr. Bancroft, under date of the 28th ultimo, the undersigned hastened to take the necessary steps to cause an investigation to be made into the proceedings taken against Mendel Cohn, with regard to his call into military service in Prussia.

The undersigned has now the honor most respectfully to inform the minister that, from the preliminary result of the examination, so far as yet carried, the person in question was, it appears, born at Tchwente, in the district of Flatow, and emigrated to America about eight years ago, but returned to Germany in January, 1872, married at Flatow, and settled there.

It thus seems that article 4 of the treaty of February 22, 1868, applies to the case, and that there can be no doubt of the competency of the Prussian authorities to summon the said Cohn to military service, without regarding his naturalization as an American citizen.

While the undersigned reserves a definite reply in the matter, until the receipt of the full report of the provincial authorities, he was unwilling to omit to bring these facts at once to the knowledge of Mr. Bancroft, and avail himself at the same time of this occasion to renew the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

SIR: My last act of public duty before leaving Berlin shall be to ask you to express to the President my grateful sense of the honor which he has done me in the language which he used in granting me my discharge from the public service. I can receive it with a good conscience, for I have never, so far as I know, missed an opportunity of carrying out the instructions of the Department, and promoting to the best of my ability the honor and the welfare of the country. You in Washington can hardly conceive the degree of comfort secured to our German fellow-citizens by the peaceful security which they obtain for their visits in Germany by the treaty of naturalization. From 10,000 to 15,000 of them come yearly to their mother country now, without suffering the least anxiety, where before many of them, in order to see their friends, were obliged to remain on the other side of the frontier or come into Germany stealthily, running the risk of arrest every hour.

During the war between Germany and France, great efforts were made to turn the current of opinion and the feeling of the German government against the United States on account of sales of arms to one of the belligerents. It was to me a very great source of satisfaction that complaints were happily prevented. Our happy co-operation in the San Juan arbitration led to the most pleasing and satisfactory results. Take it for all in all, my mission to Berlin has rounded off in the pleasantest manner the years of my life that have been devoted to the public service, and I may say that my unsolicited appointment by Mr. Johnson and my new commission from Mr. Grant have made to me the years of my great old age the flower of my life.

SIR: I have presumed that I was carrying out the wishes of the President in writing a congratulatory letter to Prince Bismarck on his narrow escape from the hands of the assassin at Kissengen.

It does not yet appear to be clearly proved that there is any connection between the ultramontane party and the deed, but there are not wanting certain reported incidents which may, on closer investigation, confirm the belief that there is such a connection.

The wound itself does not appear to be of any importance, but the general condition of the prince's health is such that the incident may prove more serious to his system than is now anticipated. I telegraphed you in cipher as follows: "Congratulated Bismarck in name of President."

I hope that the Department will approve my action in sending the note of which a copy is herewith annexed.

[From the Spenersche Zeitung, Berlin, July 15, 1874.—Translation.]

THE ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EMPIRE.

Detailed accounts have already been published of the attempt, which was so happily frustrated, to assassinate Prince Bismarck. The National Zeitung publishes the following letter, dated Kissengen, July 13, 4 p. m.:

In order to give an idea of the localities, I must premise by saying that Prince Bismarck occupies rooms in the house of Dr. Diruff, which is situated on the other side of the Saale, on the right-hand side of the bridge. Close by the bridge is a garden in which refreshments are served, kept by one Braun, and here, at the hour of noon, a large number of people usually assemble for dinner; in the immediate vicinity of this garden is a large house, the rooms of which are rented to visitors; this house also belongs to Braun. Next to this is Dr. Diruff's house, the first story of which is occupied by Prince Bismarck. On the other side of this latter building is a hotel, (Holzmann's), which is also visited by many guests at noon-time. The place where the attempt at assassination took place therefore usually presents a lively appearance at noon, and, as the chancellor is in the habit of going to the saline (salt-bath) in his carriage at this time, the crowd of people desiring to see the renowned and popular man is then unusually large. A large crowd was thus collected to-day when Prince Bismarck entered the royal carriage, at half past 1 o'clock, on the south side of Dr. Diruff's garden, while an attendant for the bath took his seat by the side of the coachman on the box. When the carriage entered the main-road a man, wearing a coat of the kind worn by Catholic priests, stepped before the carriage, (as I am informed by Schmidt, the royal Bavarian coachman, who was driving,) so that the coachman was obliged to slacken his pace and tell the man to get out of the way; the latter, however, did not deign to comply until he had been several times ordered to do so. The carriage, meanwhile, had advanced as far as Braun's refreshment-garden, and at that moment a pistol was fired at the prince by some one standing very near to him. The coachman, almost petrified with fright, still had the presence of mind to look around. Seeing that the prince was apparently unhurt, he was about to drive on, and turned about toward his horses again, when he caught sight of the assassin, who, throwing his pistol away, was endeavoring to disappear among the crowd of people who had collected from the neighboring restaurants and houses. The coachman now dealt the would-be assassin a severe blow in the face with his whip, and, at the same time, a guest at one of the hotels (Mr. Lederer, an actor in the court theater at Darmstadt) seized him by the throat. The assassin struggled furiously to get away, (Lederer's hand is badly bitten,) but the crowd held him securely; he was seized by every part of his body; and so great was the indignation which prevailed that the people were almost ready to tear him to pieces. The prince, fortunately, was little hurt; a slight scratch on his right wrist was the only visible indication of the attempted assassination. Prince Bismarck stepped down among the crowd and endeavored to quiet them, saying that they must "give the man up to the authorities." When it appeared evident that the chancellor was not dangerously wounded, all crowded around him. Every one desired to express his sympathy, indescribable confusion prevailed, and some time passed before it became possible to clear a path for the prince, so as to enable him to reach his lodgings.

Meanwhile the assassin was rather dragged than led to the city prison by the crowd. He gave his name as Kullmann, and said that he was a journeyman-cooper from Magdeburg; in answer to further questions, he said that he had done the deed solely of his own accord. He is a young man, nineteen or twenty years of age, and of a very coarse appearance; he looked to me, however, like a crafty fellow and hardened villain, but by no means like a fanatic. In the first excitement every one was inclined to believe that he had been hired to commit the crime. How correct this opinion was, I will not undertake to determine; it is, however, certainly remarkable that the attempt was made so soon after the disappearance of the person wearing a priest's coat, to whom I have referred above.

Notwithstanding the mental excitement which was very naturally produced by the occurrence, Prince Bismarck was able to visit the court-house at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, wearing his arm in a sling. He desired to converse with his assailant. What was said during the interview, as well as the result of the preliminary examination, will not be made public just yet. When the assassin's person was searched, a piece of paper, it is said, was found in his possession, on which, in an elegant hand, were written the words, "In the house with the name of Dr. Diruff, jun., on the door-plate."

As I write this, an excited crowd surges in the street and in front of the prince's lodgings. The prince has several times been obliged to show himself to the people, who keep continually shouting and calling for him.

A telegram to the same paper, dated this morning, says: "It appears that Prince Bismarck was preserved by a kind of miracle. It was only because in saluting he had kept his hand raised that he was not hit in the head. The prince suffers severe pains in his hand, and finds it very difficult to write. His general condition, however, is very favorable."

A letter addressed to the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung says that just as the prince's carriage had passed the house, a short man, in the garb of a priest, stepped in front of the horses in such a way that it became necessary for the coachman to rein in his horses. It is elsewhere stated in the same paper that the house occupied by the prince stands on the right bank of the Saale, overlooking the valley, and is only separated from the bridge across the Saale by a house and garden. The carriage had scarcely reached the house which adjoins the bridge when, by order of the prince, the driver turned his horses in the opposite direction; the prince sprang out and entered his lodgings, while the coachman drove into the yard. The people were so taken by surprise, and the whole thing happened so in a moment, that it was not till then that any one started in pursuit of the assassin, while the priest was lost sight of in the chase, and thus escaped, leaving no trace behind him. (Has since been arrested.—EDITOR.) The assassin ran toward the bridge, and right into the arms of Mr. Lederer, brother of the well-known tenor. This gentleman, whose attention was attracted by the report of the pistol, was just coming out of the restaurant which adjoins the bridge, and seized the fellow. Several gentlemen rushed to Lederer's assistance, and rescued him from the hands of the assassin. One of his thumbs had been badly bitten, and he himself almost strangled by the wretch. The latter was then conveyed, or rather dragged, by the people to prison. Another suspicious individual, who was about to leave by the 2 o'clock train, and who was heard cursing Prince Bismarck, was also arrested.

The priest, who had been walking back and forth since 11 o'clock in front of the prince's lodgings, in company with the assassin, and who, just before the shot was fired, sprang before the horses, is still at large. It is, however, absolutely certain that the person arrested is not the party who really planned the attack. It is to be hoped that the examination of the prisoner will throw light upon this subject. The ball slightly scratched the place mentioned in the telegram; that is, the part between the fleshy portion of the thumb and the palm of the hand. The prince appeared at the window several times, in answer to the shouts of the multitude. The wound was somewhat swollen, and bled, but did not prevent the free movement of the thumb.

We will add that the little village of Walchsee, of which the arrested priest Hantaler is a native, is situated in the extreme northwestern part of Tyrol, a few leagues to the northwest of the well-known fortress of Kufstein.

For our own part we hesitated to hold the ultramontane party responsible for the crime of the Kissengen assassin, so long as we had no convincing evidence of their guilt. The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung is not so considerate. It says:

"Those who planned the deed of whose execution the person arrested was only the half-purposeless instrument, can now boast that they have brought a disgrace upon the German name which is not eclipsed even by the brilliancy of our recent history.

"We cannot anticipate the sentence of the judge, and cannot know what has been planned in the Catholic societies and conventicles of which the criminal is a member, for the purpose of hastening the 'favorable moment.' This last occurrence, however, considered in connection with the facts which have already been proved, with the dark threatenings and the passionate expressions of the ultramontane press, and other things which have come to light, give good ground for the belief that the hands which armed Ravallac and Gerard, the assassins of Henry the Fourth and William of Orange, also loaded Kullmann's pistol."

The same paper hopes, in conclusion, that the nation, recognizing and casting out its unsound elements, will stand firm in the great policy of our time, rallying with enthusiasm around the emperor and his government, and says:

"This attempt at assassination was committed on the anniversary of the day of Ems. The day of Ems led Germany to unity and political greatness, and the day of Kissengen will furnish a new point of departure for freedom and intellectual greatness."

The Germania (Catholic) says: "All Germany, without distinction of party, will unanimously condemn, with the deepest indignation, the criminal who raises his hand to commit a deed of murder. The history of the world shows but too many murders and attempts at murder which had their origin in political animosity. The horrible nature of this crime is, however, in no wise mitigated thereby. And particularly may one feel indignant at such an undertaking when any one apparently a Christian, who even imagines that he is laboring for the faith and for the church, allows himself to be so blinded by passion or ambition as to disregard the teachings of his faith, and commit the greatest violation of the divine order of the world. We do not know how correct the reports may be in relation to Kullmann's membership of a Catholic society, or to his 'suspicious association with a Catholic priest,' or to the arrest of Rev. Mr. Kotteler, and we shall therefore await the result of the judicial investigation. It is not incredible that, in consequence of the many persecutions of our party and of our church, an amount of hatred, passion, and rage may be bred in the breasts of some individuals, which may at length burst forth in rebellion against all law, both human and divine; but it is incredible that a dispassionately thinking man should recklessly impute to a party an excess committed by one or by several individuals belonging to that party; for that, among fourteen millions of Catholics, there should be one madman or one infatuated lunatic will not, perhaps, appear so passing strange even to the chancellor of the empire himself. A portion of the press, however, will of course not hesitate for an instant to lay the blame due to one person upon the whole party, or even upon the church, which, in her teachings, declares such a crime to be one of the greatest. We already have some evidences of this."

The Germania then refers to the articles of the Börsenzeitung and of the Berliner Tageblatt as thus casting the blame upon the party and the church, and says, in conclusion:

"Fortunately, those papers still remember the attempt of Karl Blind, of May 7, 1866, and what they say in relation to that will be regarded by the thinking portion of their readers as nonsense. The Tageblatt even seems to think that the attempt at assassination which was made by the adopted son of the democrat Blind, is somewhat disturbing in the cursing of the ultramontane party; it therefore seeks to excuse Blind's attempt, so as to be enabled to paint Kullmann in still blacker colors. 'There was a time,' it says, 'when it was possible to be mistaken as to his (Bismarck's) genius, his grand patriotic idea, and the lofty goal that he had in view. At that time a similar attempt was made. Now, however, the repetition of such an attempt at assassination must seem threefold, nay, tenfold atrocious.' We entertain the same feelings toward both Blind and Kullmann, and would merely remind the Tageblatt that, according to its way of measuring the guilt, Kullmann has decidedly the advantage, for Blind had hardly been so deeply, so systematically, and so cruelly wounded in his convictions and feelings as Kullmann, supposing the latter to have acted from fanaticism, and not from other motives. We would, moreover, remind those 'liberals' who may be pleased to chime in with the tone of the Börsenzeitung, that pretty much all of the attempts at assassination that have been made of late years, (we refer to those directed against Napoleon III, the Emperor Francis Joseph, the Prince Regent of Prussia, and against Bismarck in 1866,) are to be attributed to 'liberalism' or national ideas, and, therefore, to anything but Catholic motives. As regards the attempt made by Oscar Becker, it has been proved that he desired to become a martyr to those German ideas which 'liberalism' has encouraged, both before and after the crime, and which it has partially carried into effect."

The Kreuzzeitung is very sparing in the description of the impression made upon it by the attempt to assassinate Prince Bismarck. It is glad, however, that "this criminal attempt to take the life of the chancellor of the empire has also failed, and that the hand of the wretch, which, impelled by hatred and revenge, sought to do that which belongs to God alone, was not permitted to pollute the soil of Germany and to burden the conscience of the people of Germany by a political assassination." It says nothing more on the subject.

The Post reminds its readers of the difference between the state of things which prevailed in 1866 and that which prevails in 1874. The love and respect which Germany feels for the chancellor of the empire were not easily earned, it says. No; they were obtained step by step; it was only by degrees that the ice of misunderstanding was thawed which lay between Germany and Germany's most faithful son; the offense that was committed in those days of misunderstanding by a stripling whose mind was full of the erroneous ideas of German fanatics who had sought refuge on a foreign soil, could not now be committed again. The Post then refers to the causes of the crime, and although it does this but indirectly, holds the clerical agitation responsible for it. We now know exactly what are the consequences of this continued agitation. Such exciting of the popular passions should not be tolerated in a well-regulated state. Quousque tandem?

With regard to the view taken by the foreign press of the matter, we are as yet able to say nothing definite. Our readers have already seen the telegram which appeared in our last evening's number, and which announced the warm sympathy expressed by the London papers for Prince Bismarck, and spoke of the effect which those papers expect the crime to have upon party affairs in Germany.

VON BÜLOW.

No. 269.

Mr. Nicholas Fish to Mr. Fish.

No. 9.]

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Berlin, July 27, 1874. (Received August 13.)

SIR: Referring to Mr. Bancroft's dispatch No. 599, of the 26th of June, I have the honor to transmit herewith a note of Mr. Von Bülow upon the same subject, together with a copy of my reply.

The language of the note of Mr. Von Bülow is such as to indicate a very firm determination to prevent the performance of such acts by our consular officers.

If this intention should be carried out it may cause very serious embarrassments to our system of consular verification of invoices. Mr. Von Bülow does not state whether the objection extends to the taking of testimony of German subjects who appear and testify without opposition on their part. In the expectation of your reply to Mr. Bancroft's question I have not asked the views of this government on this point.

According to the consular regulations, in the execution of a commission to take testimony the consular officer acts simply as a citizen of the United States. The question thus arises as to how far he can be held liable in his official capacity for such action.

I hope I may receive the views of the Department at an early day, as the government here seems anxious to have the question determined.

In regard to the particular case that has led to the correspondence, I have written to each of the consular officers mentioned therein, except to the consul-general in Berlin, intimating to them the difficulties any further action on their part might create.

In the case of Consul-General Kreismann, I have communicated the same verbally.

I remain, &c.

NICHOLAS FISH.

Mr. von Bülow to Mr. N. Fish.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Berlin, July 25, 1874.

The undersigned has heretofore, under date of the 24th ultimo, had the honor to make known to Mr. George Bancroft that, according to reliable information, it was intended, in pursuance of a judicial order of the United States district court of New York, to take the testimony of a number of German citizens or their representatives, through the instrumentality of the American consuls at Aix-la-Chapelle, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Berlin, and Leipsic, assisted by commissioners sent to Europe for this purpose, in the matter of an action instituted by the customs authorities in New York against a branch house in that city of the firm of S. N. Wolff & Co., of Cassel. He at the same time expressed the hope that that communication would suffice to prevent the actual exercise of the functions claimed for consular officers in the German Empire in the said judicial order, but not warranted by the provisions of Article IX of the German-American convention of December 11, 1871.

The undersigned has not been favored with an answer thereto. On the other hand, intelligence has just reached him that the vice-consul of the United States at Barmen, Mr. Ernst Greef, accompanied by Mr. Roger M. Sherman, assistant United States attorney, southern district of New York, had presented himself on the 16th instant at the bureau of the steel and copper-ware manufacturers, Brothers Lüttger, at Petersmühle, and on the 18th instant to Mr. F. C. Lurmann, at Iserlohn, in order to take the testimony of the representatives of these firms in reference to certain facts bearing upon said action. True, in both instances the information demanded was refused, but in both instances the vice-consul of the United States had notified the above-named gentlemen that citations before the American consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle and Frankfurt-on-the-Main, respectively, would be issued against them at an early day.

In one instance the matter had been carried so far that it was intimated that a refusal to give the desired information would entail upon the respective firm increased difficulty in the transaction of its American business.

To the undersigned it seems indubitable that in accordance with the said consular convention, American consular officers are only entitled throughout the German Empire to take the testimony of citizens of the United States within the bounds prescribed in Article IX, and that all official action exceeding the limitations contained therein appears to be a trespass irreconcilable with the lawful rights and duties of the German authorities.

Instructions will therefore be immediately issued to the competent tribunals to cause investigation to be made into the action of the above-mentioned American vice-consul at Barmen, as well as into the proposed official proceeding of the above-mentioned consulates, and to make report of the result of said investigation.

The undersigned, while he has the honor to bring the above to the notice of Mr. Fish, cannot of course claim to be in possession of an accurate knowledge of the facts of the case, established by both sides.

These complaints of German citizens are, however, probably not without foundation in fact, and in this case, the matter being as urgent as his desire is sincere and earnest to see every occasion for a difference of opinion avoided, he takes the liberty to request the chargé d'affaires on his part to consider what is proper to be done to provide against the consequences to the said consular officials necessarily following the transcending of their functions as limited by treaty and exequatur.

Respectfully awaiting an answer to this note, the undersigned gladly avails himself of this occasion to renew, &c., &c.

VON BÜLOW.

Mr. Nicholas Fish to Mr. von Bülow.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Berlin, July 27, 1874.

The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of his excellency Mr. von Bülow, secretary of state for foreign affairs, of the 25th instant, and he finds from the archives of the legation that the note of his excellency of the 24th ultimo was referred by Mr. Bancroft to his Government.

There has not yet been time for a communication in return, and, as the undersigned is without any exact or official knowledge of the case, he has referred the note which he himself received in like manner.

In the mean time the undersigned, sharing as he does most fully the desire expressed by his excellency to see every occasion for a difference of opinion avoided, believes that the views of his Government, which he will have the honor hereafter to transmit, will be conceived in like spirit.

The undersigned feels persuaded that the actual facts in the case, when ascertained, will show that whatever may have been done in the premises by the consular officers of the United States has been done under an order of a court of law of the United States and for the sole object of subserving the cause of truth and justice.

The undersigned gladly avails himself, &c.

NICHOLAS FISH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 1, 1874.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 15th ultimo, No. 4, inclosing, with extracts from the German press, a copy of your note of the 14th ultimo to Prince Bismarck, congratulating him upon his escape from assassination, has been received.

Your action in congratulating the prince, as communicated by telegraph, has already been approved in No. 684, from the Department.

I am, &c.,

JOHN L. CADWALADER,
Acting Secretary.

No. 271.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Nicholas Fish.

No. 697.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 17, 1874.

SIR: I have to acknowledge your dispatch No. 3 of the date of the 11th of July last, transmitting the correspondence between Mr. Bancroft and the minister of foreign affairs in relation to the interpretation and application of the fourth article of the naturalization treaty of February 22, 1868, between the United States and the North German Union.

Mr. Bancroft's note of 28th June to Mr. von Bülow correctly sets forth the interpretation of that article of the treaty as understood by this Government, and it is with much satisfaction that the President learns that that interpretation is not controverted by the German government, which declares its intention to execute the treaty at all times with the greatest moderation and respect for the rights of individuals.

The point suggested by Mr. von Bülow that the treatment of each case must depend entirely upon the circumstances of the same, is in accord with the position which this Government holds. The value of American citizenship must not be trifled with; this high right must not be invaded by fraud or by false representations; and when honestly acquired, and faithfully maintained, must carry with it to its possessor all the privileges and the protection which a great government can give to its citizens.

The case of Mentheim Cohn seems to be disposed of without admitting the inference drawn by Mr. von Bülow. From his recital of the facts of the case, it cannot be denied that that inference is, at the least, plausible.

The legation will in the future continue carefully to watch the rights of all naturalized citizens of the United States who may visit or temporarily tarry in Germany, and will assert for them all the privileges and immunities to which they are entitled by treaty or by public law. At the same time it will be careful not to commit the Government of the United States in a demand for its protection in behalf of one who may be manifestly presenting a false or fraudulent claim of citizenship, or who may have already forfeited his right of citizenship in accordance with the letter and spirit of the treaty.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

No. 698.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 18, 1874.

SIR: Referring to Mr. Bancroft's dispatch No. 599, inclosing a copy of a note addressed to him by Mr. von Bülow in reference to an order issued out of the district court for the southern district of New York, naming certain consuls of the United States to take testimony in an action therein pending in behalf of the Government, against the firm S. N. Wolff & Co., and to your dispatch No. 9, inclosing a second note from Mr. von Bülow on the same subject, I now inclose you a copy of a letter addressed to this Department by the Attorney-General, with a copy of a letter from Mr. Bliss, the United States district attorney at New York, in reference to the question, and a copy of the order complained of.

It appears to this Department that the German Government has labored under a serious misapprehension in the matter.

The minister of foreign affairs objects to the taking of the desired testimony by the consuls, under the commission in question, on the ground that it is an exercise of functions by consular officers in the German Empire not warranted by Article IX of the German-American convention of December 11, 1871.

Under our system of jurisprudence, where the testimony of persons beyond the limits of the United States is desired by either party to an action pending in the courts, the same is taken on commission. For this purpose application is made to the court in which the action is pending, and when granted, a person is agreed on by the parties, or named by the court, to take the evidence, and an order is entered in the court to that effect.

Questions are prepared by each party, which are propounded to the witnesses by the person so named, or an oral examination is sometimes provided for, at which both parties are represented by counsel.

The answers to the questions are taken, and the evidence thus taken is certified by the commission named, and returned to the court to be read at the trial.
